When a report allotting homestead is presented to the court, it may approve the report or, for good cause, set it aside and direct a reallotment

When a report allotting homestead is presented to the court it may approve the report,[83] or, where there is good cause to do so, it may set the report aside and direct a reallotment,[84] or it may itself fix the amount of the allotment[85] It has been held that good cause for setting the report aside is shown where it appears that the appraisers were incompetent or not duly qualified,[86] that the appraisers set off two tracts of the statutory size instead of one,[87] that their valuation of the premises is grossly excessive or inadequate,[88] or that the allotment is void for uncertainty[89] Ordinarily, however, the court will not disturb the sworn report of commissioners in the absence of some element of fraud,[90] or serious mistake on their part,[91] or some substantial defect in the proceedings[92] The fact that the homestead might have been allotted so that it would be more convenient for the claimant constitutes no ground for setting aside the report[93]

(2) Proceedings

Either party may apply by motion to have a report allotting homestead set aside. The application must comply with statutory requirements The parties are entitled to a hearing on the application, and usually the court's ruling is subject to review

Either party may in a proper case apply by motion[94] or otherwise as provided by law[95] to have the report of appraisers or commissioners set aside and a new appraisement and allotment made The application must be made in strict conformity with the requirements of the statute[96] It must be filed within the time prescribed by statute,[97] or within a reasonable time, if no time is fixed by statute[98] If the debtor objects to the value stated in the report he should except at the time[99] and cannot afterward show on a claim for further exemption that the property assigned was not of the value stated in the return[1]

Sufficiency of allegations, exceptions The application must allege facts sufficient to bring the applicant within the scope of the statute permitting it[2] Exceptions to the report of appraisers may be filed in an action wherein a judgment has been rendered against the debtor by a creditor who has a suit then pending[3] Exceptions must set out the facts on which they are based[4]

Filing and notice of exceptions Ordinarily exceptions must be filed, personal service on the adverse party being insufficient[5] If a dissatisfied party has filed exceptions and they have been placed on the court calendar a reasonable time before the commencement of the next term, no notice of such filing need be given to the adversary[6]

Notice of trial It has been held that the filing of exceptions to the report will constitute sufficient notice of trial[7]

Hearing As the duty of appraisers is confined to determining value and allotting homestead bounds, as explained supra § 218, these are the only questions presented to the court on a hearing of objections to the appraisers' report,[8] and the equities of the parties will not be adjudicated by the court on such hearing[9]

Under some statutes questions arising on exceptions must be tried by the court on evidence adduced and testimony taken in open court[10] One who excepts to the report of commissioners setting off to her as homestead only part of a tract claimed on the ground that the value of the entire tract did not exceed the statutory exemption may give evidence as to the value[11] The court in passing on a report need not hear evidence showing an unwise division of the land, where the facts sought to be proved would not warrant a recommittal of the report[12]

Review Where a review by appeal or otherwise is allowed from the approval or disapproval of a report of appraisers, the rules governing review in courts of last resort ordinarily are controlling[13] Accordingly all presumptions are indulged in favor of the regularity of the appraisers' appointment and qualifications,[14] and, where proof of value of the premises is conflicting, the judgment of the lower court refusing to interfere with the appraisers' valuation will not be disturbed,[15] nor will the appellate court consider an exception to the report in the absence of facts in the record supporting the objection[16]

(3) Effect of Approval or of Setting Aside, Reappraisement

An approval of a report allotting homestead fixes the homestead limits A disapproval nullifies the appraisers' action If reappraisement is ordered, new appraisers will be appointed

When exceptions are overruled and the report of commissioners or appraisers allotting homestead is confirmed, the right to the homestead is complete,[17] and the homestead limits become fixed.[18] On the other hand, when the report is set aside the debtor is left where he was before the appraisers' action.[19]

Reappraisement If a reappraisement is ordered, the new appraisers may be appointed by the court at the suggestion of the judgment creditor and without notice to the debtor.[20]

§ 220. —— Operation and Effect

a In general
b Collateral attack

a. In General

An assignment of homestead has the effect of designating the homestead. In some jurisdictions the assignment is conclusive even though there is a subsequent increase or decrease in the value of the homestead assigned

Until the conveyance of the homestead is complete it is not too late for another judgment creditor to object and require a reassignment.[21] Setting apart the homestead does not of itself discharge the property from liability for debts where a return and record of the allotment proceedings are required,[22] nor does the allotment, when completed, determine title or create the exemption, since it is only a method of designating the homestead and ascertaining the excess.[23] Where a mortgaged homestead is levied on and appraised, necessarily subject to prior recorded encumbrances, it will be inferred that the mortgages were considered both on the appraisal and at the sale.[24]

Conclusiveness of assignment in general The debtor, failing to except to, or appeal from, the assignment, is estopped to question it,[25] nor can a creditor levy an execution thereafter against the land or demand a reassignment of homestead,[26] unless the allotment proceedings were under a void statute[27] or the conditions existing when they were had have since materially changed.[28]

Increase or decrease in value of homestead allotted Where a homestead has been assigned to a debtor and subsequently it increases in value so as to be worth more than the statutory limit, it may be reassigned in some jurisdictions and the excess applied to the payment of the homesteader's debts,[29] and in these jurisdictions, if the assigned homestead depreciates in value, the homesteader may add to it and claim a revaluation.[30] In other jurisdictions, however, the rule is that no reallotment of homestead is allowable where no fraud or want of jurisdiction appears and there is no specific statutory provision sanctioning it, even though the premises have, since the original allotment, increased[31] or decreased[32] in value.

b. Collateral Attack

Usually a homestead allotment is not open to collateral attack except where it is absolutely void

As a general rule, neither the debtor nor the creditor can attack the appraisal and allotment by collateral proceedings, but should address objections directly and in the same proceeding to the court receiving the report.[33] Nevertheless, where the court or body assigning homestead is without jurisdiction of the subject matter, the attempted adjudication is void and subject to collateral attack,[34] and it has been held that a proceeding by a judgment creditor against his debtor and his grantee, to whom the sheriff had allotted a homestead, to have the allotment declared void, and to direct the sheriff to proceed with a sale of such lots under the execution in his hands, will not be dismissed on the ground that plaintiff should have proceeded by a motion in the cause.[35]

§ 221. —— Claiming Successive Exemptions

While a homesteader is not entitled to successive exemptions, he may sometimes make successive claims to different parcels of land in order to obtain the full quantum allowed by statute.

The debtor is not entitled to successive exemptions,[36] but he may sometimes make successive claims to different parcels of land in order to secure the full quantum allowed by statute.[37]

§ 222. Disposition of Property and Rights of Purchasers

Under the practice prevailing in some, but not all, jurisdictions, where the value of property including a homestead exceeds the amount of the homestead exemption, the court may order a sale of the whole property and apportion the proceeds as between the homestead debtor and his creditor.

Not in all,[38] but in many states it has been held that, where the value of the premises exceeds the statutory exemption limit, the court may order a sale of the entire premises and direct a proper division of the proceeds for the purpose of segregating the value of the excess from that of the exemption,[39] although it is also recognized that instead of ordering a sale of the premises the debtor may be allowed to retain the premises on proper conditions,[40] but cannot be compelled against his wishes to sell his own interest[41] or to buy that of the creditor.[42] The order of sale should specify the portion of lands exempt,[43] and if the entire property is sold the terms of sale should be cash, at least to the amount of the homestead exemption.[44] If a sale of the whole property does not bring an amount in excess of the exemption, it should be abandoned and no further proceedings taken,[45] but if the sale brings more than the statutory exemption the officer conducting the sale should, out of its proceeds, pay the amount of the homestead exemption to the execution debtor.[46] Where, following a sale of property, plaintiffs have not in fact been deprived of their homestead but still occupy it with title thereto, they may not maintain a suit against the sheriff to recover part of the proceeds of the sale.[47]

§ 223. —— Sale of Property Subject to Homestead Right

Under some statutes no sale of the residence property can be made subject to the homestead right; but under other homestead laws such a sale is allowed.

Under some statutes no sale of the residence property can be made subject to the homestead right,[48] but under other homestead laws such a sale is allowed,[49] apparently on the theory that the homestead is not an estate in land.[50]

§ 224. —— Retaining Property beyond Exemption on Payment of Excess

A debtor is sometimes permitted by statute to retain the whole of premises including a homestead where he pays the excess in value over the statutory exemption or where he pays rent for the excess.

Where premises including a homestead cannot be divided so as to set off the homestead without injury to the remainder, the debtor under some statutes may pay the excess above the statutory exemption to his execution creditor and retain the property.[51] Under other statutes he may retain

§ 225. —— Rights of Purchasers

a. In general
b Under sales in violation of homestead laws
c. Under sale subject to homestead
d. Right to possession during period of redemption

a. In General

A purchaser of a homestead at a valid execution sale acquires the interest of the homesteader in the premises. Usually the purchaser may raise the same objections to the claim of homestead as could the creditor.

A purchaser at a forced or involuntary sale of homestead property may in general raise the same objections to the claim of homestead by the debtor as could the creditor under whose judgment he has acquired title to the premises.[53] He cannot be forced to accept, in full satisfaction of any supposed liability of the debtor, the latter's deed releasing homestead rights in the land purchased,[54] nor is he rendered a tenant in common with a debtor or to whom upper stories of the family residence are allotted as exempt, where the purchaser buys the lower stories at the execution sale.[55] If the sale is valid, the interest acquired by the purchaser is that of the homestead claimant freed from the burden of homestead.[56] On a sale under execution of the debtor's interest in lands held by him as a tenant in common, the purchaser takes the remainder of the debtor's share in the land left after allotting to him a homestead in the premises.[57]

Where the statute requires a creditor to file an affidavit stating that the homestead exceeds a given value before he may sell on execution, a purchaser at such sale is chargeable with notice whether the affidavit has or has not been filed.[58]

Grantee of purchaser. A grantee of the purchaser acquires no better title than that of the purchaser himself.[59]

Purchase subject to prior assignment of homestead. A purchaser at a sheriff's sale is bound by a prior assignment of homestead where he buys subject thereto.[60]

Redeeming creditors. Judgment creditors who redeem homestead property sold on execution stand in the shoes of the purchaser at the execution sale.[61]

b. Under Sales in Violation of Homestead Laws

As a general rule a forced or involuntary sale of homestead premises in violation of the homestead law passes no title to the purchaser.

The general rule is that a forced or involuntary sale of homestead premises in violation of the provisions of the homestead law confers on the purchaser no title thereto[62] or any right of possession,[63] and in consequence he has no rights against the debtor's grantee,[64] even though the debtor abandons the premises subsequent to the sale.[65] A common application of the rule is that, where land is in fact a homestead of the extent and value allowed by law, and not in excess thereof, an attempted sale thereof is void and conveys no title to the purchaser.[66] However, the purchaser's title may be rendered good by acts of the owner which work an estoppel, such as holding out a third person as owner,[67] and a limitation of the rule has been recognized in a case where no claim of homestead rights was made.[68] It has also been held that where the statute is otherwise complied with, but the sheriff pays over to the homesteader less than the required amount, the purchaser's title is valid.[69] Further, it has been held that a purchaser's title cannot be defeated on the ground that the land sold was exempt from sale, where he purchased at a forced sale invalid because the execution was not a lien on the property, but there was, in the sheriff's office at the time the execution was improperly levied, another writ of the same nature which was a lien on the homestead, although not levied and not known by such purchaser to exist,[70] where property was sold under two foreclosures in the same suit if one of the two liens was valid and enforceable against the homestead,[71] where a foreclosure sale of the homestead was made in connection with other lands without inquiring, as the statute directed, whether it could be sold separately,[72] unless such irregularity injured the person questioning the sale,[73] or where a sheriff's sale made under order of sale on foreclosure and under a void execution was confirmed and, after expiration of the redemption period, a deed was executed.[74]

Where the creditors of a vendor who has conveyed his homestead extinguish an encumbrance thereon, and sell the property under execution against the vendor, the purchaser at the sheriff's sale cannot have the original encumbrance enforced against the property in an action brought to set aside the sheriff's deed.[75]

Failure to make due allotment of homestead. Where an appraisal and allotment of homestead are required either with or without a claim or demand therefor, the rule laid down by the weight of authority, without reference to the extent or value of the property sold, is that a sale of the premises without an appraisal and allotment of the homestead conveys no title,[76] but in some jurisdictions this rule is operative only with certain qualifications,[77] nor is the rule applicable, as will be seen infra subdivision c of this section, in jurisdictions where the sale may be made subject to homestead rights.

Recovery back of purchase money. When the homestead has been unlawfully sold and the exemptioner recovers it back from the purchaser, the latter is entitled to recover from the exemptioner the purchase money which was applied in satisfaction of the judgment against the exemptioner.[78]

though no allotment was previously made.[79] In some jurisdictions he becomes a tenant in common with the homesteader and entitled to share equally in crops growing at the confirmation of the sale.[80] He is not entitled to compensation, however, for improvements erected by him on the land before his complete rights as owner mature,[81] and, if he buys the undivided interest of the debtor subject to the homestead, the latter may be set off from the portion allotted to such purchaser on partition.[82] Where there is in fact and in law no homestead, a sale of premises in which the homestead is claimed subject to the right of homestead passes the fee to the purchaser under the sheriff's deed.[83] The purchaser of property subject to a mortgaged homestead right can redeem the property only in the manner prescribed by statute.[84]

Under the statutes in some jurisdictions a homestead claimant ordinarily is entitled to possession of the homestead premises during the period of redemption from execution or mortgage foreclosure sale

Where homestead property is sold under execution, a claim of homestead filed prior to judgment ordinarily carries with it the right of the judgment debtor to occupy the premises during the period of redemption.[85] This rule, however, is inapplicable where the judgment represents the purchase price of the homestead premises.[86]

Where homestead property is sold at a mortgage foreclosure sale, the judgment debtor has a right under the statutes in some jurisdictions to occupy during the redemption period the premises used by him as a homestead[87] if the premises are actually occupied by him.[88] Under these statutes proper proceedings should be taken by the judgment debtor in order to establish his right to possession.[89] Where the homesteader retains possession of farm land during the period of redemption and does not redeem, crops raised by him during such period are not subject to a lien in favor of the purchaser at the foreclosure sale for taxes paid by him during the period of redemption or for interest accruing during such period on his judgment.[90]

Who is "judgment debtor"

(1) A purchaser of mortgaged premises, when made a party to the foreclosure suit and against whom the decree runs, becomes a "judgment debtor" and is entitled to the right of possession under the statute, notwithstanding a discharge in bankruptcy had released him from personal liability on the mortgage note.—State ex rel. In a proper case the question may be determined on the mortgagee's petition for writ of assistance.—State ex rel. O'Brien v. C. PROCEEDINGS FOR ENFORCEMENT AND PROTECTION OF HOMESTEAD RIGHTS

§ 226. Jurisdiction

A court of general jurisdiction has jurisdiction, where the issue is properly before it, to decide whether a claimed homestead exemption exists and embraces a particular debt, and courts of equity have inherent jurisdiction to afford relief to a homesteader whose rights have been, or are about to be, infringed.

Courts of equity have inherent jurisdiction to afford relief in respect of the protection or recovery of homestead property where the rights of the owner therein have been infringed or are in jeopardy through no fault of his own[91] As appears infra § 228, this jurisdiction is frequently invoked in suits to enjoin sales of the homestead which are for any reason illegal, and in suits to set aside sales of this character as constituting a cloud on title, and under some statutes courts of equity alone have jurisdiction of suits for the recovery of property which has been sold after having been set apart as a homestead[92] However, in the absence of any special statutory provision on the subject, relief may be had in a court of law, as, for instance, where the homestead right is set up either as a cause of action or a defense in a suit of ejectment, see infra § 228, or where motion is made to set aside a sale of the homestead premises on execution, see infra § 229 It has been held that a court of general original jurisdiction necessarily has jurisdiction, whenever a homestead exemption is claimed in an action pending therein, to determine whether the particular debt is or is not one for which a homestead may be seized and sold and whether the claimant of the homestead exemption possesses the qualifications necessary to entitle him to a homestead[93]

Where a sale of homestead property was confirmed without any provision having been made to compensate the debtor for his homestead interest in the property, the court had jurisdiction to determine the debtor's claim to a portion of the proceeds even after the expiration of the term at which the sale was confirmed[94]

A homesteader may maintain an action or assert a defense for the protection of his homestead right or to prevent its infringement. In a proper case, an action for damages for the unlawful sale of homestead property may be maintained.

The owner of a homestead may maintain an action or assert a defense for the protection or enforcement of his homestead right or to prevent its denial or infringement,[95] as where the homestead property is, or is about to be, unlawfully sold on execution[96] or in consummation of a fraud[97] The particular remedies available are considered infra §§ 228, 229

Action for damages It has been held that one whose homestead has been unlawfully seized and sold may sue the officer and purchaser for damages, and need not pursue the property[98] However, where no injury can be shown, the homesteader cannot maintain an action against the sheriff and his sureties for an unlawful levy and sale of the premises[99] The wife has been denied the right to recover damages from a sale of the homestead[1]

§ 228. Nature of Actions or Proceedings in Which Relief Granted

According to some authorities, the question of homestead exemption may be raised in an action of eject-ment brought by or against the debtor. A suit for an injunction or to set aside a sale are among the equitable remedies available to the homesteader.

Although there is some authority apparently to the contrary,[2] the weight of authority is that the question of homestead exemption may be raised in an ejectment suit brought by,[3] or against,[4] the debtor, except where courts of equity are vested with exclusive jurisdiction over matters of homestead right.[5] In some states an action of claim is a proper remedy to contest a levy on, and sale of, the homestead.[6] The fraudulent grantee of a homestead cannot maintain trespass against a creditor of the fraudulent grantor who seizes it on execution.[7]

Equitable remedies generally The general rule that equitable remedies are not available if there is an adequate remedy at law applies to remedies for the enforcement or protection of homestead rights.[8] A wife who has been ousted from her possession of the premises after an abandonment by the husband may assert her rights by a bill in equity.[9] Homestead rights may be claimed and allowed in a suit to marshal liens against property which had been fraudulently conveyed.[10]

Injunction Since a judicial sale, even though invalid, casts a cloud on the debtor's title to the homestead so disposed of, an injunction will lie,[11] at least until the determination of the right or claim to the homestead exemption,[12] against an unauthorized levy of execution or a sale of the premises, or against the issuance of a deed and the conveyance of the homestead,[13] and the same remedy is available against an eviction by one who purchases at a sheriff's sale, where the levy of execution is made subject to the homestead interest,[14] or against one who buys pending an application by the judgment debtor for his exemption,[15] or against the foreclosure of a mortgage on the home tract,[16] or a sale under a power therein contained,[17] or under a foreclosure of an attachment lien.[18] The court will not, however, determine the homestead right on affidavits filed on a motion for a temporary injunction to restrain a levy,[19] nor will the injunction issue where the applicant has an adequate remedy at law[20] by protecting his homestead under the statute of exemptions,[21] as where the sale would not defeat complainant's homestead right.[22] In proceedings to enjoin the sale of the debtor's homestead on general execution, the creditor may successfully defend by showing that the claim on which his execution rests is excepted by statute from the homestead exemption.[23] The granting or denial of a temporary injunction is a matter of discretion.[24] The right to an injunction to restrain the sale of the property under judicial proceedings is predicated on the absence of any adjudication in such proceedings of the claim to homestead.[25]

Bill to set aside A remedy frequently resorted to is a bill in equity to set aside a sale of the homestead premises for any reason improperly made as being a cloud on title.[26] It has been held that the fact that the sale is void does not affect the right to this remedy,[27] but there is also authority to the contrary.[28] A bill to set aside a levy on the ground that the property is a homestead will not lie, where proceedings for the debtor's protection are provided by statute,[29] but it has been held that if equitable jurisdiction to entertain such a bill existed prior to the time when a legal remedy was afforded, it will continue to exist until abolished by some prohibitory legislative enactment.[30] A court of equity will not set aside a sale on the ground that the homesteader was given no notice or opportunity to select his homestead, where it does not appear that he was injured by the failure to receive such notice or opportunity.[31] Where the contention that the realty was homestead was not raised in the court ordering its sale and hence was not considered on appeal from such order, the order was neither void nor voidable, and the owner could not maintain an independent action to cancel and set aside the sale and to recover damages for his ouster under a writ of possession.[32]

Suit to quiet title It may be proper to determine a claim of homestead exemption in an action to quiet title[33] and homestead rights may be asserted in a suit by the owner to quiet title after the purchaser has taken possession.[34]

§ 229. —— Motions and Other Summary Remedies

Motions or other summary remedies are sometimes available for the protection of homestead rights.

In some jurisdictions the homestead exemption may be presented by a motion to set aside the sale on execution or decree,[35] made in the action or suit in which the execution was issued or order of sale was made,[36] and not by a separate action,[37] but in other jurisdictions it must be brought before the court by a direct action.[38] A rule against the sheriff to show cause why he should not levy on and sell the homestead has been held to raise the question of a debtor's rights in the property sold, where there is no serious dispute on any question of law or fact,[39] but, although there is authority to the contrary,[40] it has also been held that the homestead right cannot be presented by resistance to a motion to confirm a sheriff's sale of the premises.[41] A rule to recover exempt proceeds of homestead property paid by the sheriff to judgment creditors under a judgment subsequently reversed has been held proper.[42] A petition to set aside a default, decree, and foreclosure sale is addressed to the discretion of the court.[43] In a proper case a levy on homestead property may be quashed[44] on the court's own motion.[45] A court rule requiring a bond of a litigant seeking an order to stay a sale under execution is not applicable to a proceeding by a judgment debtor for an order directing the sheriff to set off a homestead in the land and staying the sale of the land until this has been done.[46]

§ 230. Time to Sue and Limitations

The right to question or obtain relief from a sale of homestead property may be lost by the operation of a statute of limitations or by laches.

If the statute limits the time within which a sale of the homestead may be questioned through legal proceedings, it, unless they are excepted by its terms, applies to minors and married women as well as to other claimants,[47] and to sales made in good or bad faith;[48] and if the statutory period expires the homestead right may be lost by the adverse possession of a wrongful occupant.[49] Under a statute so providing, a homesteader's action to prevent ouster from realty selected as homestead after the sale on execution is instituted in time[50] Limitations do not run against a creditor as to a homestead until it has ceased to be such[51]

Laches. In a proper case the laches of the homestead claimant may defeat a proceeding on his part for the protection of his homestead rights[52] Thus an injunction will not issue in a case where a homesteader has been guilty of laches[53] However, it has been held that a party, as long as he is in possession of the property he claims as homestead, cannot be barred by laches from suing to protect his rights[54]

Questions as to what persons are proper or necessary parties in proceedings to enforce or protect homestead rights are determined in accordance with general rules.

The person entitled to the homestead, whether the husband, father, or other person as the case may be, as the real party in interest or the representative of the family, ordinarily is a proper party in proceedings for the enforcement and protection of the homestead.[55] Thus a husband in joint possession with his wife of land belonging to her but used as the family homestead has, as head of the family, such an interest in the land as entitles him to complain of any unlawful interference with it[56] However, it has also been held that the beneficiaries have such an interest in the use and enjoyment of the property as will entitle them to protect it[57] Thus the wife or the wife and minor children have such an interest in the homestead premises as will entitle her or them to maintain an action or defense for the assertion or protection of the homestead rights,[58] especially is this so where the husband is absent,[59] or refuses to join in the suit,[60] or has abandoned his family[61] Under a statute giving a cause of action to the wife or family of the debtor for damages for a wrongful levy on the homestead, the wife may maintain such an action, or the husband, as head of the family, may do so and hold the recovery, if any, for the family's use[62] Where a married woman is invested by statute with the right to sue alone in an action involving or concerning her right or claim to homestead property, she may sue alone in an action to quiet title to property claimed as a homestead, and she need not establish a valid homestead right before suing[63]

Necessary parties According to some decisions, the wife is a necessary party to a suit brought to protect the property from unauthorized sale,[64] or to determine the question whether the premises are a homestead[65] It has been held that the wife is an indispensable party defendant to an action to establish an interest adverse to the right of homestead on the property upon which she and her husband reside and title to which the husband claims [66] Some courts hold that the wife is a necessary defendant when, and only when, she has a defense arising from her homestead interest which would defeat the action,[67] and even where she has such a defense, while she is a necessary party defendant in the sense that she cannot be concluded by the judgment unless she is joined, she is not an indispensable party in the sense that the proceedings are so defective without her as to be subject to a plea of misjoinder [68] Where a statute requires the actual occupant to be made a party defendant in an action of ejectment, a husband and wife who occupy premises owned by either as their home must be joined as defendants [69] A person having no justiciable interest in property claimed to be a homestead on which a lien is sought to be foreclosed is not a necessary party to the suit [70] The wife is not a necessary party to the husband's action for injury to his land where the record shows that the case must be determined on the theory that the land is not a homestead [71]

Joinder Joinder of husband and wife has been held proper in a suit by them to set aside on the ground of fraud a deed executed by them covering the homestead [72] Where the homestead of husband and wife was held in the wife's name, and they both testified that it was the property of both, they were properly joined as plaintiffs in an action for damages thereto [73] When the legal title to a homestead is in a wife, but the larger portion of the purchase price was paid by the husband, their joint interest in the preservation of the homestead gives them the right to join as plaintiffs in an action to enjoin its sale.[74] Also the wife may properly be joined as a party with her husband as a joint plaintiff in an action to determine adverse claims to the homestead,[75] although the legal title is in the husband's name [76]

Attaching and execution creditors It has been held that attaching creditors should be made parties to a proceeding by the debtor to require payment to him, in lieu of a homestead, of funds held by a sheriff after sale of the premises,[77] and that in an action to enjoin a sale of land claimed as a homestead nonresident execution creditors should be made parties defendant,[78] but that the execution creditor is not a necessary party to a suit to enjoin a levy, at least after answer and trial without objection made because of such nonjoinder [79]

Defendant in garnishment may voluntarily appear or be cited in by the garnishee, that he may protect his rights arising from the fact that his credit is exempt as the proceeds of a sale of a homestead [80]

Sheriff It has been held that the sheriff is not a necessary party defendant to a bill seeking a homestead allotment and to enjoin a sale ordered by the court,[81] but there is also authority to the contrary [82]

In proceedings for the enforcement or protection of homestead rights, matters of pleading are governed by the general rules pertaining thereto.[83]

Right of homestead, necessity for averment. If a homestead right is relied on, either as a cause of action[84] or as a defense,[85] it must be pleaded by the person so relying on it, and ordinarily no duty rests on the person asserting a claim against the property to anticipate the defense of homestead.[86] But, although there is authority to the contrary,[87] it is very generally held that it is unnecessary for the debtor to allege that the debt sought to be enforced against the property is not embraced within any of the statutory exceptions,[88] it is for the party seeking to enforce his claim against premises alleged to be a homestead to allege that the claim is one against which exemption is unavailing[89] Neither is it necessary for the debtor to anticipate and negative any matters whereby he might be considered as having forfeited his right of action;[90] and estoppel of the debtor to assert his homestead right must be alleged by the adverse party[91] Defects in, or omissions from, the debtor's pleadings may be cured by averments or denials contained in the pleadings of his adversary which clearly recognize the homestead character of the property[92]

Right of homestead; sufficiency of averment The sufficiency of a pleading asserting a homestead exemption is governed by the general rules applicable to pleadings[93] The pleading in which a debtor asserts a homestead right must set forth facts establishing the right and not merely allege in general terms that such right exists[94] Hence, although he need not name in specific terms the statute under which he acquired his right,[95] everything made essential to the exemption by law must be alleged,[96]

In trespass to try title
(1) In Texas it has been held on the one hand that, in trespass to try title, the defense that conveyance was invalid as to the grantor's wife, who did not join therein, because of homestead rights, must be pleaded, a plea of not guilty being insufficient —Guarantee Mercantile Co v Nelson, Tex Civ App, 223 S W 543

(2) But it has been held that, in view of the statutory provision that in an action of trespass to try title the only defensive plea required is that of not guilty, such a plea is sufficient to raise the issue of homestead—Smith v Simpson, Tex Civ App, 97 S W 2d 522, error refused and that the premises claimed continued exempt to the time of levy and sale.[97] More particularly, the debtor must show that he is a member of that class of persons for whose benefit the exemption exists,[98] but he need not declare of whom his family consists,[99] or aver in exact words that he was a bona fide housekeeper with a family at the time of levy, where his occupancy and its character otherwise appear,[1] or show the exact character of the homestead.[2]

By reason of the particular statutory requirements for the acquisition of a homestead, see supra §§ 29–48, it may be necessary to allege that the premises claimed as homestead have on them a dwelling constituting his residence,[3] that he is a "householder,"[4] that he owns the property or has such interest in it as will support a homestead exemption for his benefit,[5] that the premises have been occupied under such circumstances that a homestead has actually been acquired,[6] that the word "homestead" is written on the margin of the recorded title of the premises occupied as a homestead,[7] and that the value of the property does not exceed the statutory limitation,[8] although there are decisions to the contrary of this last proposition.[9] It may also be necessary for him to allege when the debt was contracted.[10]

Description of premises Where the homestead is part of a larger tract,[11] or if the party claiming it claims as tenant in common,[12] the pleading should specify the part claimed as a homestead. An equitable petition to restrain interference with the homestead is demurrable where the premises claimed as a homestead are not sufficiently described.[13]

Miscellaneous averments The debtor is not required to aver a notification of the officer levying on the home property, if such notice is not prescribed by law[14] Where a petition in a suit to enjoin the sale of lots on execution on the ground that they were part of plaintiff's homestead did not allege that plaintiff at the first opportunity pointed out or offered to point out personal property on which to make the levy, he cannot object that the court sustained a special exception to other allegations of his petition that the levy was unlawfully, spitefully, and willfully made, without demand for payment or to point out a levy being made of plaintiff, when he had personal property subject to execution in the county and was personally present there all the time[15] It has been held that a complaint which alleges that the debtor had offered other property to be levied on in satisfaction of the debt is bad if it does not allege that the property so offered belonged to the debtor[16] A plea to the jurisdiction alleging the homestead character of property sought to be reached by foreclosure is not demurrable[17] In a suit to enjoin the sale of certain lots on execution on the ground that they were part of plaintiff's homestead, plaintiff is the one seeking affirmative relief, and hence a contention that the answer filed by defendant is insufficient in its allegations for affirmative relief to sustain a judgment against plaintiff and foreclosing an execution lien on part of the property is without merit[18] If the petition to enjoin a sale under decree or judgment proceeds on the theory of fraud, the fraudulent acts must be averred,[19] and it will not be sufficient to allege generally that the decree or judgment was procured by fraud[20] A petition seeking to remove a cloud on the debtor's title, created by a sheriff's deed to a purchaser at execution sale, need not state how such deed constitutes a cloud[21] The debtor need not, in pleading his rights in a second homestead, allege that he sold the former one with the intention of investing in another[22] In an action for damages for a wrongful levy on homestead property, the allegations must be sufficient to overcome a presumption of due performance on the part of the levying officer[23]

b. Amendments

Pleadings may be amended in a proper case in accordance with general rules

In accordance with general rules of pleading, if the pleadings are defective in form or substance they may be amended,[24] provided no new and distinct cause of action is thereby added, or new and distinct parties introduced[25] However, the adversary should be given notice of material amendments permitted by the court[26] A party cannot in his answer claim to be the owner of real property and after that issue has been decided against him amend his pleading and claim a lien[27]

c. Issues, Proof, and Variance

Only issues raised by the pleadings may be considered, and only evidence relevant to such issues should be admitted.

As a general rule, only issues raised by the pleadings may be considered,[28] and only evidence relevant to such issues should be admitted[29] A homestead claimant fails to raise an issue respecting his right of exemption where he does not allege his occupancy of the premises as a residence[30] or does not claim a homestead by his pleading or evidence[31] If the homesteader pleads an intention to occupy the premises as a residence when the debt was contracted, he cannot prove actual occupation at that time,[32] but evidence that premises were used in connection with the residence is admissible under an allegation that they were part of the homestead, in the absence of objection to the latter averment because too general[33] An issue may sometimes be involved without special reference thereto in the pleadings when it is plainly inferable from their allegations.[34] An allegation of wrongful abandonment of her husband by a claimant may be negatived by proof that she was driven from home by his cruelty, although such facts were not pleaded by her[35] Under the allegation, based on his recorded homestead declaration, that he was the head of a family with dependent children, plaintiff could prove that, after his children were no longer dependents, and their mother dead, his dependent family consisted of a wife of a second marriage and other dependents[36] Where husband and wife file separate declarations of homestead as to the same property, the court will not require an election as to which of the declarations they rely on, in a contest with creditors[37]

Under general denial or general issue A general denial permits of evidence of voluntary abandonment of a homestead,[38] but the rule is otherwise where, in addition to the general denial, special defenses other than that of abandonment are pleaded[39] One who resists the claim cannot question whether the premises exceed the value fixed by law by filing a general denial to a plea of homestead[40] However, it has been held that a wife, sued in ejectment with her husband by the latter's grantee in a deed in which she did not join, may assert her homestead rights under the general denial, inasmuch as it may be shown under the general denial that a deed was executed by a grantor wanting in capacity.[41] In an action of trespass to try title, evidence of the homestead character of the premises in controversy has been held admissible under a plea of not guilty[42]

a. In General

Evidence in proceedings to enforce or protect homestead rights is considered in the ensuing subdivisions of this section Evidence of acquisition and establishment of homesteads generally is considered supra in § 51, and evidence of abandonment, waiver, or forfeiture is treated supra §§ 196–198. The rules of evidence in proceedings to avoid homestead conveyances are considered supra § 154, in proceedings to enforce claims against homestead property supra § 117, and in proceedings to enforce rights under a homestead conveyance supra § 151

b. Burden of Proof and Presumptions

As a general rule the party asserting the homestead right has the burden of proving its existence, and the party seeking to enforce a claim against the property has the burden of proving that the exemption does not apply to his claim

The general rules governing burden of proof and presumption will control in proceedings to protect and enforce homestead rights[43] While there is a presumption that the homestead of a debtor is exempt from sale on execution,[44] and that a state of facts which entitles one to a homestead continues until the contrary is established,[45] it is generally held that one who claims a homestead right in premises in proceedings instituted by him to protect the right or in proceedings in which he asserts the right as a defense has the burden of establishing it,[46] although there is also authority to the contrary;[47] and it has been held that he has the burden of establishing this right, although plaintiff holds the affirmative in the pleadings, as where the petition alleges that the land is not exempt from execution and is not occupied by defendant as a homestead.[48] Nevertheless, it is only necessary that claimant should establish a prima facie right to a homestead exemption.[49] Claimant need not show affirmatively that the debt against which he asserts his exemption is not privileged.[50] Where a judgment debtor sets up a claim to money in the hands of a garnishee as exempt as being the proceeds of a homestead, he has the burden of proving this fact.[51]

Value. The rule is that the burden is on the party setting up a claim to a homestead to show that the premises so claimed do not exceed in value the statutory exemption,[52] but there are decisions which hold that it is not presumed that the premises held as a homestead exceed the statutory limit of value,[53] and that, if the creditor claims that the debtor's interest in the property exceeds the homestead exemption in value, he has the burden of proving such claim.[54] If the commissioners refer in their report to the debtor's "homestead," it will be presumed to be of the full statutory value.[55] The evidence of value must relate to the time when the value is an issue,[56] as, for instance, at the time of the levy and sale under execution of the premises claimed as homestead,[57] for there is no presumption that the value remains unchanged during a series of years.[58]

Identity. The party asserting the homestead has the burden of proving what land constitutes the homestead, where such an issue arises.[59]

Fraud. If one claiming a homestead charges that the judgment under which it was sold was obtained by fraud, the burden of proof is on him to establish that fact.[60] Where it is shown that a vendor's lien notes were fraudulently executed without consideration for the purpose of raising money with a homestead as security, the burden is on plaintiffs, assignees of the notes and lien as collateral for a loan to the payee, in an action to foreclose the lien for payment of the balance on the notes, to show the amount due on the note for which they were collateral, even if they are innocent holders of the notes.[61]

c. Admissibility

The admissibility of evidence is governed by general rules

In proceedings to protect or enforce homestead claims any competent and material evidence bearing directly on the existence of facts which are pertinent under the particular homestead law,[62] or tending to show the exempt character of the property claimed as a homestead,[63] is admissible. Accordingly there may be admitted proof of circumstances under which a former home was sold and another purchased,[64] evidence of the intention of the parties,[65] evidence of intention of the homesteader and his wife to occupy the premises in question as a home,[66] evidence of a creditor's levy subject to the homestead estate,[67] the filing of a certified copy of a claim for exemption in accordance with statutory requirements,[68] the occupation of land as a residence by the debtor at the time and since the debt or lien was created,[69] and a schedule of the debtor's real and personal property duly returned to the ordinary and recorded.[70] Declarations made in disparagement of the existence of a homestead are competent in favor of one claiming adversely.[71] Evidence is admissible, on the question of notice to the lender, to show that the agent who made a loan on property subsequently claimed as a homestead was previously instructed not to lend money on homesteads and to require applicants to make affidavit as to what constituted their place of residence.[72] Evidences of indebtedness given by the homestead claimant to third persons are admissible as tending to disprove his claim that the property in question was paid for exclusively with rents and profits from a homestead.[73] It may be shown by documentary evidence that after the homestead was set apart it was sold on execution to satisfy a judgment to which it was subject, and that the purchaser conveyed it to the debtor's wife, such evidence tending to prove loss of possession and of homestead rights.[74] If the issue is whether a homestead was set off to a widow as head of a family, it may be shown by parol that she paid the estate of her deceased husband the excess in value over the statutory limit of a homestead.[75]

On the other hand, evidence which is irrelevant, incompetent, or immaterial is inadmissible.[76] Thus a wife cannot testify to her ignorance of the contents of a mortgage or mortgage application signed by her where there is no issue as to the genuineness of her signature or as to fraud in procuring it.[77] Where defendant claimed the right to hold property sued for under an alleged parol partition awarding the property to her husband as a homestead, evidence that plaintiff as executor of the will of his deceased wife under which the property had passed had taken advice of attorneys prior to his son's marriage and had been advised that he could not set apart any portion of the property of the estate to his son until his daughter arrived at the age of twenty-one is inadmissible as irrelevant.[78] Where a judgment debtor excepts to the return of the appraisers assigning him a homestead, and his exception is based on the ground that the exemption was laid off to him in his wife's lands and not in his own, the debtor's statements, not sworn to, are incompetent evidence.[79] Evidence that the debtor's wife was on friendly terms with him and accompanied him when he absconded and abandoned the homestead is not competent where the issue is the existence of a homestead right.[80]

Evidence of void proceedings had on claims for an allotment of a homestead is not admissible to show the existence of the homestead privilege or the character of the premises.[81]

Value Competent and relevant evidence as to the value of property claimed as exempt is admissible.[82] Thus, in ascertaining the value of the property, evidence is admissible of improvements made thereon[83] before and after the owner abandoned them,[84] but assessment rolls on which the property is listed are not competent evidence for that purpose.[85]

Consideration of debt If it is sought to prove that the debt in question was or was not enforceable against the homestead, its consideration, although it is a debt reduced to judgment, may be shown.[86]

The general rules regarding the weight and sufficiency of evidence in civil actions apply in actions involving homestead rights.[87] To establish the fact of a homestead, every fact essential to its existence must be shown.[88] In the notes cases are referred to in which may be found illustrations of evidence held sufficient to show a right to a homestead,[89] to show a right to a business homestead,[90] to show a continuation without break on exchange of an old homestead for a new one,[91] to show or sustain a finding that a homestead was exempt from sale under execution for a particular debt,[92] that a homestead was urban rather than rural[93] or rural rather than urban,[94] that there was no right to a homestead,[95] that there was no unreasonable delay in asserting claim to homestead,[96] that a judgment debtor with certain others constituted a "family,"[97] that homestead claimant falsely represented himself as unmarried when obtaining a loan without joinder of his wife in the encumbrance,[98] or to show or support findings as to other matters,[99] or to sustain a judgment or decree in favor of[1] or against[2] the homestead claimant. Also referred to are cases in which may be found illustrations of evidence held insufficient to show a right to a homestead,[3] to show a right to a business homestead,[4] to show that a purported sale of a homestead was a simulated transaction,[5] to show that the homestead claimant was the sole surviving constituent of the family,[6] or to show or sustain findings as to other matters,[7] or to sustain a verdict, judgment, or decree for[8] or against[9] the claimant.

Value. Value of premises may be shown by evidence of an offer by the debtor to sell for a given amount.[10] In the absence of any other evidence of value, the owner's testimony that he would take a certain sum for the homestead is evidence of its value.[11] The homesteader's admission under oath that the homestead exceeded the value allowed by statute has been held conclusive against him.[12]

Where the opinions of witnesses differed widely as to the value of the homestead, a valuation in accordance with the average value fixed by the witnesses has been sustained.[13] In a number of other cases the sufficiency of the evidence as to the value of the property has been considered.[14]

§ 234. Trial

Instructions, findings, and other aspects of the trial of the proceedings are governed by the general rules applicable in civil actions.

The trial of proceedings to protect and enforce homestead rights is controlled by the usual rules governing procedure in civil actions generally Questions of law and fact in such proceedings are discussed infra § 235

Instructions. The general rules relating to instructions in civil actions apply in proceedings of the character under consideration[15] Accordingly it has been held that an instruction is improper if it suggests an issue not properly within the case,[16] or which is inapplicable to the evidence,[17] or if it is confusing or misleading[18] or incorrectly states the law[19] An instruction should be refused which withdraws from the jury an issue the determination of which will ascertain the homestead rights of parties to the suit[20] A charge may be erroneous also for an omission to define terms employed in it[21] Where the charge as a whole is sufficient, a party cannot complain of the failure to give a particular instruction which was not requested[22]

If a charge concerning abandonment of the residence property ignores the element of an intention to return, it is erroneous,[23] and it is error to charge that there must be both abandonment and the acquisition of a new homestead before there is a loss of the statutory exemption[24] An instruction which requires the concurrence of the wife in the husband's intention not to return to occupy the homestead as such in order to constitute an abandonment is erroneous[25] If a plea of abandonment has been pleaded and the debtor was not in actual occupation at the time the debt was created, it is not necessary to charge expressly that the burden of proving abandonment is on the creditor[26] An instruction, on an issue whether land had been abandoned as a homestead, that the burden was on plaintiffs to show the abandonment, but that such proof might be made by facts and circumstances or by circumstances alone, if the jury deemed the same "sufficiently strong and cogent," is not objectionable as requiring greater certainty of proof than was proper[27]

An instruction was properly refused which stated that a second parcel of land leased by the debtor from a landlord other than the party from whom he had previously leased his residence tract must be designated as a homestead as fully as the original homestead was designated[28] So it is error to tell the jury that the intentions of the homesteaders respecting the future occupancy of their property are immaterial if, by representing that the premises had never been occupied as their homestead, they had obtained the loan sued for where the evidence tended to show their statements to the creditor that they intended moving upon the property to live as soon as their children completed their education[29] The jury may be told that, if they find

Growing crops

The court need not inform the jury that growing crops ready to be harvested are not in themselves exempt but when on a homestead they cannot be levied on, it having already instructed that to sustain a claim by the homesteader for damages in levying on growing crops the jury must find that such crops were on the homestead land—Moore v Graham, 69 S W 200, 29 Tex Civ App 235

Time of forming intention

A charge on the issue of abandonment, asking the jury to find whether or not the homestead claimants, prior to the levy, left their homestead with the intention never to return to it as a homestead, was not erroneous, as against the contention that the charge should have informed the jury that the intention not to return and occupy the land as a homestead could have been formed after claimants had left the land and before the levy—Farmers' State Bank of Georgetown v Roberts, Tex Civ App, 59 S W 2d 1089, error dismissed

the property in controversy was set off to the homesteader by partition and became his separate property, they should find it was a homestead[30] The court may properly instruct that the husband alone has the right to designate a homestead, and that unless he intends to use the property as a home it will not be impressed with that character, although the wife may have intended making it her abode[31] Where the facts involve a question of bona fide purchase for value and without notice of notes which recite that they are given in part payment of land subsequently claimed as exempt from their collection, the court should instruct that a purchase of the notes prior to the makers' occupancy of the property as a homestead and prior to their manifesting an intention so to occupy, the purchaser of the notes being without notice of such intended occupancy, would render them enforceable against the property[32]

Verdict and findings. The general rules as to findings in civil actions apply[33] Answers to immaterial issues submitted to the jury may be disregarded[34] A judgment cannot be based on irreconcilably conflicting findings on material issues[35] A finding that the applicant is entitled to a homestead means a homestead in the entire real estate involved in the application[36] If it is found that two parties executed a declaration of homestead "as husband and wife," this will not be considered equivalent to stating that they were then husband and wife, but that they represented themselves to be such in their declaration[37]

While the owner of a business may have the right to elect, if he is engaged in two businesses, which he will hold as his business homestead, see supra § 40, a finding of the jury that his principal place of business was one and not the other shows an election[38] A finding that an uptown office of wholesale grain dealers was used as an auxiliary to, and in connection with, the plant which they claimed exempt from a trust deed as their business homestead, is not inconsistent with a finding that the uptown office was their principal place of business as wholesale grain dealers[39]

A verdict enjoining interference with the homestead by a mortgagee should not restrain the creditor from enforcing his rights after termination of the homestead[40]

A statement of value contained in the verdict includes the value of the premises with improvements, where the further finding appears that the land with improvements would not have brought over a given amount upon certain named dates[41]

If the subjects of rents and the proportion in which claimants of a homestead are entitled are not litigated, a verdict need not dispose of such matters, but the court may distribute the rental funds on the basis of the respective interests which the litigants have in the premises as fixed by the verdict[42]

§ 235. —— Questions of Law and Fact

If the evidence on an issue of fact is conflicting or such that several conclusions might reasonably be drawn therefrom, the issue is for the jury, but if only one conclusion is possible the issue should be disposed of by the court

If the evidence on any issue of fact is conflicting or such that several conclusions might reasonably be drawn therefrom, the issue is one for the triers of fact[43] The existence of facts on which a homestead exemption is predicated ordinarily is a question of fact[44] Accordingly it has been held that it is for the jury to determine whether the premises have been dedicated or occupied as a homestead,[45] whether claimant was the head of a family during his occupancy of the premises in suit;[46] whether a tract situated in or adjacent to a town was a rural or urban homestead;[47] the value of improvements on the land claimed as homestead;[48] and whether a tract of land adjacent to a dwelling is embraced within the homestead of which the dwelling house is a part[49]

Questions for court and direction of verdict. If the evidence is not conflicting as to any material issue, and but one conclusion can reasonably be drawn therefrom, the question becomes one of law and the court may and should direct a verdict[50] If the evidence is clear and uncontradicted that a mortgagee was ignorant of the fact that the mortgaged property was a homestead at the time the debt was contracted, the court may instruct the jury to find an absence of such knowledge respecting the character of the land[51] Where the petition shows that the land sought to be recovered had been set apart as a homestead and had been sold without an order from the probate court to defendant who was put in possession, and these allegations were not denied, the court may direct a verdict for plaintiff for the premises[52] Although a piece of land separated from the tract on which the dwelling is situated may be so used as to make it a part of the homestead, testimony merely that land so situated was considered by the owner as part of his homestead is not sufficient to establish that fact so as to justify a peremptory instruction[53]

§ 236. Judgment and Enforcement

The judgment or decree must conform to, and be supported by, the pleadings and proof. Its effect and conclusiveness are governed by general rules.

The judgment or decree in a proceeding to enforce or protect homestead rights must conform to, and be supported by, the pleadings and the proof,[54] it should not grant more than the pleadings and proof warrant,[55] or determine issues not involved in the proceeding[56] Thus, if a creditor attempts to subject his debtor's homestead to sale, it is error to adjudge the entire property to the debtor's wife as exempt on her petition therefor, in the absence of any denial by her of the allegations of the creditor's petition[57] Where the proceeding is in equity, the court may afford complete relief to all parties before it, although such relief was not specifically prayed for by each of the respective parties[58] An injunction decree should not be so broad as to pre-

Injunction on conditions

Trial court did not err in enjoining defendants from bringing on sale of plaintiff's realty under execution until plaintiff's application for homestead should be finally determined, although plaintiff had given a deed and a note containing a homestead waiver to a banking company and one of the defendants after obtaining judgment against plaintiff and being unable to find property of plaintiff on which to levy a fieri facias paid amount of note to banking company and received a deed from banking company where injunction was conditioned on payment by plaintiff into court of amount owed on note—Pass v Pass, Ga, 23 S E 2d 697

Apportionment of mortgage debt

On application by mortgagors to compel purchaser at foreclosure sale to pay them amount of bid above amount due on special execution, vent defendant from exercising such rights as he has or may in the future acquire against the property.[59] Where the debtor attempts to enjoin the enforcement of a judgment against property, including the homestead, on the ground that a lien was improperly taken by the judgment creditor against such property, his relief will be confined to the homestead premises.[60] If the debtor fails in a suit to restrain a sale of his residence premises by a trustee under a trust deed, the decree should not direct their sale by the sheriff[61]

Judgment for the exemptioner may properly be based on findings sufficient when taken together to establish his right of homestead,[62] as, for example, on findings that before levy the exemptioner intended in good faith to occupy the premises as his home and had taken possession for that purpose within a reasonable time thereafter;[63] and it has been held that a decree allowing a claim of homestead should find all facts necessary under the statute for its existence[64] So, in an action to quiet title to realty by one claiming under a conveyance from a judgment debtor before an execution sale on the judgment purporting to sell plaintiff's property to satisfy the debt involving questions of judgment lien against land and whether it had been the judgment debtor's homestead, it was error to enter judgment for defendant without any determination as to whether the land had been a homestead exempt from execution[65] An order putting the purchaser at execution sale in possession on the ground that the judgment on which the execution issued was for a debt constituting part of the purchase price of the property need not recite such fact[66]

If an execution sale has been set aside and the sheriff's certificate and deed canceled in order to relieve the judgment debtor, the satisfaction of the debt will also be vacated and an alias execution be issued to collect the judgment[67] A preliminary injunction against the sale on execution of homestead property will not be dissolved until final hearing, where the creditor sets up as an affirmative defense the fact that the debt is enforceable against the property as antedating its homestead character.[68] If petitioner's claim for homestead as against a liability for street improvements is denied and the case continued to fix the time and amount of his payment, the petition should not be dismissed until those facts are ascertained[69] When real estate is conveyed to a wife, or to another in trust for her, in exchange for a deed to a homestead in which she joins, the district court's judgment holding the real estate so conveyed to her as security for a judgment lien against such homestead, that was fraudulently concealed from the purchaser by the vendors at the time of the exchange, was not error[70] Because of the unseverable character of the homestead right in the husband and wife, as long as the marital relation and the homestead interest exist there can be no judgment ousting either spouse from possession where the rights of the other spouse have not been adjudicated[71] A decree purporting to extinguish the husband's homestead interest upon payment of the value thereof could not affect the wife's homestead rights[72]

Necessity of bond Where the statutes require the furnishing of a bond by one seeking a stay of execution pending appeal from a judgment or as a condition to the granting of an injunction restraining the enforcement of a judgment, the court is without jurisdiction to grant an injunction restraining the execution of an order to sell homestead property to a debtor who appealed without giving a supersedeas bond, unless such an injunction is conditioned on the furnishing of a bond as required by statute[73]

where foreclosure sale of homestead could not be attacked, if mortgagors are entitled to relief asked, amount paid by purchaser should be so apportioned that homestead would bear its proportionate amount of mortgage indebtedness—Phenix Trust Co v Vaught, 205 N W 792, 201 Iowa 150

Conclusiveness and effect. A judgment setting aside a homestead is not conclusive against a creditor who subsequently attempts to subject the land to his claim after the exemption ceases.[74] Under a statute making an order exempting property from levy or sale conclusive for only a year, a judgment should limit the period of exemption to one year.[75] A decision that the premises claimed were not the individual homestead of the claimant but came to him by survivorship does not determine the question of his rights therein.[76] The effect of an order vacating an order for the sale of a homestead on the ground that the judgment creditor had unreasonably delayed in instituting proceedings to reach the value in excess of the exemption is to relieve the property of the execution lien.[77] A decree for the sale of all right and interest in the premises in question will be presumed to pass the homestead right to a purchaser, although it is not specified.[78]

Vacation. An order which is void on its face may be vacated at any time.[79]

General rules governing review in civil actions are applicable

The fact that the debtor's wife did not join with her husband in the oath prescribed for poor persons on appeal by herself and husband from a judgment denying their homestead rights does not prevent either party from asserting those rights in the appellate court.[80] It has been held that an appeal of the entire case lies from a decision sustaining a motion to dissolve an injunction against the execution sale of the homestead, if the debtor's petition seeking to protect his homestead is dismissed at the same time the injunction is dissolved.[81]

Parties. If a wife appeals separately from a decree final against her homestead rights, it is no objection that her husband did not join, although he was a party defendant with his wife, the decree not being final as against him.[82] The purchaser of property claimed by surviving minors as a homestead is a proper party with the administrator of the deceased parents' estate, on certiorari from a decree of the probate court refusing to set aside the residence as exempt and ordering a sale of the land.[83]

The record on an appeal from a judgment determining homestead rights should show only the proceedings in the contest of those rights.[84]

Scope of review. Questions not properly raised below[85] or not properly presented before the appellate court[86] will not be considered. If the record presents a question of fact on conflicting proof, there will be no reversal, unless the conclusion of the lower court is flagrantly against the evidence.[87] Where the pleadings and evidence concerning appellant's claim to a homestead are not contained in the record, the refusal of the court to allow such claim cannot be reviewed on appeal.[88] The exercise of the lower court's discretion will not be disturbed unless an abuse of discretion clearly appears.[89]

Harmless error will not work a reversal.[90]

Disposition of case. In a suit to subject assets to judgment, a decree finding that a debtor after suit conveyed his homestead to his daughter without consideration and setting aside the conveyance will be reversed, where the value of the homestead was neither proved nor found by the decree, and there was nothing in the record authorizing the assumption that it was worth more than the exempt amount.[91] In a proper case the judgment of the trial court may be modified on appeal.[92]

In a suit to quiet title as against the lien of a judgment plaintiff's claim of homestead will not be passed on where the pleadings and findings are silent on the subject of homestead, and it appears only incidentally that there was a homestead claim in the former action in which the judgment was recovered.—Hickey v. Subsequent proceedings If there has been an appeal from homestead proceedings and the judgment in favor of the debtor has been affirmed, the creditor may not file a supplemental pleading in the lower court and reach the property by showing that the exemption has terminated [93]

Damages to a homesteader who has been kept from possession are estimated from the date of levy, and may include the rental value of the premises

Where damages are recovered by a homesteader who has been kept from the possession of his homestead, they are estimated from the date of levy,[94] and may include the rental value of the premises during the period recovered for,[95] from which should be deducted the taxes properly paid by the wrongful occupant during his possession,[96] but if the amount recovered is the value of the property and not merely the rents accrued such amount cannot be offset by the taxes paid by the wrongful occupant during his possession [97] Damages equal to the value of exempt crops wrongfully levied on are recoverable by the homesteader,[98] and cannot be offset by a recovery against him on a note in the same action [99] Where the homestead is wrongfully sold on execution and the purchaser raises a crop on the land, the homesteader is not entitled to the value of the crops as damages, although if he regains possession before the crop is matured and severed the crop becomes his property [1] The measure of damages for wrongfully impounding the proceeds of a homestead by garnishment has been held to be interest on the money impounded at the rate prescribed by law [2]

VI. RIGHTS OF SURVIVING SPOUSE, CHILDREN, OR HEIRS

§ 239. In General

Succession to, and continuation of, a right of homestead to a survivor or survivors are limited to the persons, and under the conditions, described in the homestead statute A homestead set apart to a survivor is commonly called a "probate homestead"

Succession to, and continuation of, a right of homestead by survival are limited to the persons described by the homestead statute,[3] and under the conditions prescribed by the statute,[4] so long as the survivor may assert such right,[5] and terminate with the death of the homesteader, if there is no surviving person in whom the right is continued by the statute,[6] but where the homestead character has once attached, it may continue for the benefit of a single individual who is the sole survivor of the persons or group designated [7] A surviving spouse, or person within the statute, takes the homestead rights, not by right of survivorship, but as property set aside by law from decedent's estate for the benefit of such survivor,[8] and his or her rights are neither enlarged nor diminished by the fact of such death [9] The right cannot be transmitted by descent [10]

The policy of the homestead laws generally is to secure to the surviving widow and minor children a homestead and homestead rights, and to give them special protection [11]

Probate homestead The homestead right set apart to a surviving spouse or minor children is commonly called a "probate homestead,"[12] which, as defined by statute, is a homestead set apart by the court for the use of the surviving spouse and the minor children out of the common property, or if there be no common property, then out of the real estate belonging to deceased,[13] or a homestead to be created by the probate court out of any property belonging to decedent, which was subject to a homestead at the time of his death[14] The right to such a homestead is not a vested right, but a privilege, the validity of which depends on the conditions existing when the application therefor is made[15]

§ 240. Constitutional and Statutory Provisions

Exemptions in favor of the surviving spouse or children are generally controlled by the homestead law in force at the time of the homesteader's death, and such law is generally given a liberal construction in favor of the homestead claimant

Although there is authority to the contrary,[16] it is generally held that the laws in force at the time of the homesteader's death are controlling in respect of the exemptions in favor of the surviving spouse and children,[17] and that subsequent legislation will not enlarge or diminish their rights in this respect,[18] although as to this last proposition there is some contrary authority,[19] as where the subsequent legislation is general and refers to a prior general statute[20] The proportional interests of the widow and minor children, it has been held, are determined by the law in force when the order of court is made, setting apart a probate homestead to their use[21]

Sale to pay debts of decedent A sale of homestead real estate to pay the homesteader's debts generally is controlled by the statute in force at the time of his or her death,[22] but a statute which prevents the selling of the fee of decedent's homestead until the youngest child has attained majority does not affect the rights of creditors which have become fixed before that date to have the fee, in a homestead that has come into existence before, subjected to payment of such debts at any time before or after the date of the act [23]

Descent and distribution statutes Except where it is otherwise specially provided by the homestead laws,[24] the rights of the widow and children are to be determined by the provisions of the homestead laws alone and not by the statutes of descent and distribution [25] A statute authorizing exempt property to be set aside for the surviving spouse or children does not prevail over a statute specifically providing for the descent and devise of homesteads by reason of the fact that the former statute is reenacted subsequently by the addition of a curative clause [26]

Construction of statutes Statutes or constitutional provisions pertaining to the homestead rights of a surviving spouse and minor children, generally should be liberally construed in favor of the homestead claimants,[27] but a statute authorizing property to be set over to a surviving spouse in lieu of a homestead and exemptions, which property would pass to the heirs under the common law, being in derogation of the common law, should be strictly construed [28] A constitutional provision relating to the acquisition and disposal of a married woman's separate estate, and as to its being exempt from the husband's debts and obligations, does not inhibit the legislature from providing for a homestead therein in aid of her surviving husband,[29] and, where the constitution effects equality between husband and wife as far as disposing of his or her separate estate by will is concerned, a statute reserving a homestead to the survivor of either is not unconstitutional [30] A statute providing for the setting apart of homesteads to survivors is not affected by a statute which deals exclusively with family support and the administration and settlement of estates;[31] and a statute relating exclusively to the right of exemption of a homestead from process issued for the collection of debts does not affect the right of exemption from administration and the payment of debts.[32]

Homestead laws are generally prospective, and not retrospective, in their operation.

The homestead statutes are prospective, and not retrospective, in their operation [33] A statute exempting a decedent's homestead estate in the hands of a surviving husband, wife, or children will not be construed to apply to debts contracted prior to its enactment,[34] although it has been held not to give it a retrospective operation to regard such debts as barred, provided the debtor died after the law went into effect but at the time the liabilities were incurred a general homestead exemption statute was in force [35] If land is acquired by a married woman and, before birth of issue, a law is passed giving minor children a right to the homestead of their deceased mother, superior to the husband's estate of curtesy, such law is deemed valid, as to issue subsequently born, as against the surviving husband [36]

§ 242. Course of Descent of Homestead

Except in so far as abrogated or modified by the homestead laws, homestead property descends to the heirs of the owner of the property in the same manner as other real estate, subject to the homestead rights and the claims of creditors

Except in so far as the rule may be abrogated or modified by special provisions in the homestead laws themselves,[37] homestead property descends to the

a. In General

The homestead rights of a husband generally continue, on his death, for the benefit of his widow, subject to certain limitations.

The homestead exemption continues after the death of the homesteader in favor of the widow only to the extent authorized by organic law or legislation.[46] Under the constitutional and statutory provisions of most states, and subject in some states to certain limitations hereafter considered, the homestead right or privilege does not terminate on the husband's death, but is continued for the benefit of his widow[47] and accrues to the widow, because of the homestead of her deceased husband, at the time of his death[48] and not by transfer from him.[49] If this were not so "the homestead exemption would be deprived of the feature which chiefly recommends it to favor."[50] However, the general rule is

(2) Surviving widow without dependents is entitled to constitutional homestead exemption where husband could have successfully claimed exemption.—Succession of White, 127 So. 883, 170 La. 403.

(3) Under the provision relating to homestead exemption to head of family, etc., a widow cannot claim the benefit of such exemption, unless she is head of family or has persons dependent on her for support.—Thompson v. Succession of Gow, 125 So. 588, 169 La. 546—Thompson v. Succession of Gow, 123 So. 616, 168 La. 909.

(5) Exclusive dependence is not required.—Succession of Harrington, 94 So. 447, 152 La. 927.

(6) Formerly a homestead exemption did not descend from the debtor in favor of his widow.—Briant v. Lyons, 29 La.Ann. 64—Burnett v. Walker, 23 La.Ann. 335.

that the homestead is for the benefit of both the widow and children of deceased,[51] that the widow is not entitled to exclusive possession as against decedent's minor children,[52] but that they have an equal right to occupy the homestead premises in conjunction,[53] as tenants in common,[54] or as joint tenants,[55] according as the statute may provide

Widow of second marriage. Where one who has acquired a homestead dies leaving a widow by a second marriage, the homestead right vests in her,[56] in preference to the dower rights of a divorced first wife;[57] and, if there are minor children by the first marriage, she holds as tenant in common with them[58] If she has minor children of her own and there are no children by the first marriage,[59] or if all the original members of the family have withdrawn therefrom or have attained majority,[60] the homestead inures to the benefit of herself and her minor children.

Property in excess of certain amount. A homestead vests in a widow, under some statutes, only where it does not exceed a specified value,[61] but, under other statutes, the homestead may vest in her without regard to its value[62]

b. Occupancy by Head of Family

A widow has no homestead right in property which was not occupied as a homestead at the time of her husband's death, unless such occupancy is not required by the statute.

Inasmuch as the purpose of the homestead laws is to secure to the family their usual place of residence, as stated supra § 2, the widow generally has no homestead right in property of which her husband dies seized, and which he had not occupied as a homestead,[63] or which he had abandoned before his death,[64] but a temporary absence with the in-urgent creditors or economic misfortune The stability and welfare of the state demands the preservation of the home"—In re Laughlin's Estate, Or, 134 P 2d 961, 963 tent to return is not such an abandonment.[65] However, under statutes which do not make occupancy necessary to the acquisition of homestead rights, it is not necessary either to acquisition or exemption of a widow's homestead right that there should have been actual occupancy of the land [66]

c. Residence within State of Husband or Widow

A homestead right in favor of the widow generally does not exist where the husband was a nonresident of the state, and, under some statutes, also where she was a nonresident at the time of his death.

The constitutional and statutory provisions in regard to homestead exemptions being intended for the benefit only of residents and their families, as discussed supra § 18, residence of the deceased husband within the state at the time of his death is necessary, and if he was a nonresident, there is no homestead right in favor of the widow,[67] even though he had bought property in the state and was making preparations to remove thereto,[68] but it has been held that a mere temporary absence of the husband in another state will not deprive his wife of her homestead right on his death [69]

Residence of widow Under some statutes the widow also must have been a resident of the state at the time of her husband's death,[70] but under other statutes this rule either does not obtain or is subject to material limitations,[71] as where the absence from the state was with the husband's consent and with no intent to abandon him [72]

d. Insolvency or Indebtedness of Estate

Under some statutes, a widow is entitled to homestead rights only where her deceased husband's estate is insolvent, or at least indebted.

Under some homestead statutes the estate must be insolvent,[73] or, in others, at least indebted,[74] to entitle the widow to the homestead; and the fact that the homestead was claimed by the husband in his lifetime is not, as against the heir, presumptive proof that there are subsisting debts of the estate outstanding [75] However, unless the provisions contain limitations of this character the widow's right to the exemption by survivorship is held to exist whether or not the husband's estate is indebted [76] The fact that the estate is insolvent does not take away the widow's right to homestead,[77] even though the property to be set apart as homestead constitutes the entire estate of decedent [78] Under some statutes if the value of the homestead exceeds the statutory exemption and the estate is solvent, the homestead right does not attach in favor of the widow [79]

e. As Affected by Devise or Testamentary Disposition

Under most statutes, a homesteader cannot by will deprive his widow of the homestead estate conferred on her by statute.

While the rule has been materially limited or denied altogether under some statutes,[80] under most statutes, the homesteader cannot, by will, deprive

Property passing to her under residuary clause

A statutory provision that homestead award shall not be taken from deceased's separate property otherwise disposed of by will, where there is no minor issue of deceased and surviving spouse, refers only to property devised or bequeathed to others than widow, and property passing to her under residuary provisions is subject to her claim for testator's just debts,[86] although the homestead is the only property owned by decedent at the time of his death, and he expressly directs a sale of the whole property and a distribution of the proceeds in pecuniary bequests,[87] and although the wife became insane and remained in that condition until after her husband's death.[88] The title to the property, however, has been held to pass to the devisees until it is divested by the property being set aside as a homestead by the probate court,[89] but where the will provides for the free use of the home place by the wife for her life or until remarriage, she may occupy it as a homestead as long as she pleases, after which deceased husband's interest will go to the devisees mentioned in the will.[90]

A surviving wife may be not entitled to homestead rights by reason of her having united with her husband in a conveyance or mortgage of the homestead premises, or having voluntarily abandoned them as a homestead during his lifetime

A mortgage, lease, or other conveyance not signed by the wife, or otherwise executed in violation of the prescribed statutory mode, as discussed supra §§ 126–135, will not bar her right in the homestead as survivor,[91] and the same rule has been applied where the conveyance was made shortly before her marriage to deceased.[92] It has been held, however, that if the husband conveys his homestead without the concurrence of his wife, and subsequently acquires a new homestead, although of less value, the right in the former homestead is thereby terminated, and on the husband's death the widow cannot claim the old homestead,[93] nor can the widow, whose marriage to deceased was a secret one, and who has never occupied the premises as a homestead, claim homestead rights as against a mortgagor who was ignorant of her marriage.[94]

If the wife unites with her husband in the conveyance or mortgage of their homestead, she cannot, on the husband's death, have the homestead as against the alienee or against the mortgagee until the mortgage debt is paid,[95] or at least, in the case of an encumbrance, until she has paid her ratable share of the debt,[96] and she has no right at all to a homestead after the mortgage or lien has been duly foreclosed,[97] although she may have the right to occupy the premises until a sale is had on the foreclosure.[98] By joining in a mortgage, with her husband, however, she does not relinquish her rights as against the children or heirs,[99] nor, where the mortgage was irregular or ineffective, is it such a waiver as would prevent her from seeking relief in a court of equity;[1] and, under some statutes, her joining in a mortgage does not affect her rights to free occupancy of her deceased husband's lands and to the proceeds therefrom until a homestead is set apart.[2] Her right to a homestead is not affected by a quitclaim deed from her to her husband, during his lifetime, covering the claimed homestead property.[3]

Abandonment. Ordinarily the surviving wife is not entitled to homestead in premises which she abandoned as a homestead during her husband's lifetime,[4] and if after such abandonment the property is sold and the proceeds invested in another home, the new home is not invested with the characteristics of a homestead.[5] Such abandonment, however, must have been voluntary.[6] A surviving wife is not deprived of her right of homestead after her husband's death, by abandonment, by the fact that she had been living apart from him, where the separation was by agreement,[7] or by necessity,[8] or was excused or justified by the husband's conduct.[9] The fact that the widow had lived apart from her husband, whether for her fault or his, is not an abandonment of the homestead, to which she had the privilege of returning, with her husband's consent, at any time, and which she recognized as her homestead.[10]

The existence of children surviving the husband ordinarily is not necessary to invest the widow with homestead rights.

By the prevailing rule the existence of children surviving the husband is not necessary to invest the widow with homestead rights,[11] even though the statute secures the right of succession expressly to the surviving widow and children.[12] Under some statutes, however, a widow is not entitled to a homestead if her husband dies leaving children, whether they are minors or adults,[13] or she is not entitled to an assignment of homestead out of her husband's estate if all the children have arrived at full age.[14] Under other statutes, the fact that all her children are grown and do not need support from her does not in any way affect her right to homestead,[15] and she is entitled to have it set off for her exclusive use and occupancy.[16]

band's lifetime, and may be lost by her having abandoned him without just cause, but ordinarily it is not lost by the mere fact that she did not reside with him at the time of his death

The right of the widow in the homestead rests on the validity and continuance of the marriage relationship during the husband's lifetime.[17]

Abandonment of spouse It has been held that if the wife abandons her husband without just cause, she thereby forfeits her rights, as survivor, in the residence property,[18] especially if she is guilty of conjugal infidelity.[19] If a wife, although she acts in good faith, believing her former husband is dead, remarries, and thereafter the first husband dies, she can claim no homestead rights in his property until the second marriage is annulled.[20] On the other hand, the abandonment of the husband by the wife,[21] or of the wife by the husband,[22] although coupled with conjugal infidelity,[23] has been held not to forfeit the surviving widow's homestead rights.

Separation and divorce A widow is not deprived of her homestead rights by the mere fact that she was not residing with her husband at the time of his death,[24] or that she was receiving separate maintenance,[25] unless there is a statutory provision to the contrary.[26] If she is caused to live apart from her husband without any fault on her part, as by reason of his cruelty,[27] or a voluntary separation is agreed on[28] and a division of their property is effected,[29] or if a limited divorce a mensa et thoro is obtained,[30] the wife retains her privileges under the homestead law as a survivor. After a divorce a vinculo, however, the wife can claim no rights as survivor in the homestead of the deceased husband where no such right is given to her by express statutory enactment or by the decree in which the divorce was granted.[31]

Void marriage Where the marriage is void, no right under it exists for the benefit of the surviving widow.[32]

§ 247. —— Effect of Possession of Other Property

Ownership or possession of other property by the widow ordinarily does not affect her right to a homestead

Except in so far as denied or modified by constitutional or statutory provision,[33] the fact that a widow owns or possesses property other than the homestead will not usually defeat her claim to the latter, whether such property is her separate estate[34] or was obtained through her husband;[35] and although it is a homestead obtained from a former husband.[36] However, under some statutes, a widow is not entitled to a homestead in her deceased husband's lands, if she has selected a separate homestead on her own lands after her husband's death;[37] but she cannot by such a course waive the right to a homestead which inures to her and her children as a joint right[38] If the husband conveys the home place to the wife as a gift, to be held as a residence, she is not entitled to an allowance out of his estate in lieu of a homestead after his death[39]

Insanity of the wife and confinement in an asylum do not affect her homestead rights

The fact that the wife was insane and confined in an asylum after her husband's death does not in any way affect her homestead rights[40]

§ 249. —— Waiver, Release, or Bar in General

A widow may waive, release, or be estopped to assert her homestead rights, except in so far as restricted by statute.

Under many statutes a widow may waive, or be estopped by her conduct to assert, her rights to a homestead,[41] but under some statutes the waiver may be made only in the manner prescribed by the statute[42] If a wife signs a waiver of her interest in the homestead, she is estopped to deny the validity of the instrument after the husband's death[43]

She waives her rights to rents and profits by failing to object to an administrator cultivating the home place for the benefit of the estate, where the proceeds from such cultivation are not misapplied [70]

Listing homestead as asset of estate. A widow's homestead right is not waived by her, as administratrix, filing a list of the homestead property as property of the estate and reciting that she is without property of her own, where she at all times lives on the property and claims it as a homestead,[71] or by the fact that she as administratrix lists the homestead as a part of the assets of the estate and files a final account in which the homestead is so listed and procures the approval of the account and an order of distribution, in which order the court determines who the heirs of such estate are and their respective interests therein [72]

The guardian of an insane widow cannot waive her rights to the homestead [73]

Release under order of court. A proper court may, on application of the widow, make an order entering the release of her homestead rights[74] and direct that the release be recorded for the purpose of notice,[75] and also, in the absence of prejudice to the rights of third persons, the court may allow the widow on good cause shown to withdraw such release [76]

Killing husband Under some statutes a widow who killed her husband loses her right to a homestead, but the burden of proving her guilt is on those who claim the homestead on that ground.[77]

§ 250. —— Antenuptial and Postnuptial Contracts

Although there is authority to the contrary, ordinarily a widow's right to a homestead in her deceased husband's property cannot be waived or released by reason of an antenuptial or postnuptial contract made by her.

It has been held that an antenuptial agreement whereby each party releases all interest in the property of the other operates to extinguish a widow's right of homestead in her deceased husband's property,[78] and, under some statutes, an antenuptial agreement releasing the wife's right of homestead is effective where the deceased left no minor children, but not where he left such children,[79] and the same limitation applies to a postnuptial agreement,[80] although a contention as to such release is immaterial where the widow enjoys the same use of the property under the agreement as she would if she were in possession of it as a homestead [81] On the other hand, by the weight of authority, such right of homestead cannot be waived or renounced by an antenuptial agreement,[82] particularly where the contract is unjust and inequitable [83]

A widow's right to a homestead is not released by an antenuptial contract in which she released her

Specific allegation not required to prevent waiver

Where widow alleged that the entire tract of land sought to be partitioned was subject to her homestead right and did nothing to waive that right except ask for partition, the pleadings were sufficient to show that widow did not "waive" such right notwithstanding she failed to pray specifically that her homestead right be preserved in the entire tract —Langford v Carr, 159 S W 2d 107, 138 Tex 330, affirming Carr v Langford, Civ App, 144 S W 2d 612

dower[84] or dower and distributive share[85] An antenuptial agreement to share the husband's property equally with his children does not deprive a widow of her statutory right to occupy the homestead until it is disposed of according to law[86]

A widow's homestead rights are not barred by a postnuptial agreement between herself, her husband, and the latter's heirs by which she consents to the sale of the homestead and payment to her of a child's share,[87] or by her contract of release of all claim in the homestead, in consideration of a payment to her of part of the purchase money, where such part is reinvested in a new homestead[88] A postnuptial contract providing homestead rights and other benefits for the wife in case he predeceases her precludes her from claiming any additional homestead rights as widow[89]

§ 252. —— Election between Homestead and Distributive Share, or Year's Support

Under some statutes the surviving spouse may elect to retain the homestead in lieu of his or her distributive share in the deceased spouse's property, or may elect to take a year's support out of the homestead property instead of retaining the homestead.

Under a statute which provides that on the death of either husband or wife the survivor may continue to possess the whole homestead until otherwise disposed of by law and that the setting aside of the distributive share shall be such a disposition, but that the survivor may elect to retain the homestead for life in lieu of distributive share, the right to the distributive share is a primary right of the survivor,[90] who by the express terms of the statute has the right to elect between homestead and the distributive share therein provided for[91] The survivor cannot take both, but must make an election in order to retain the homestead,[92] and on failure to do so the survivor takes a distributive share,[93] which operates as an abandonment of homestead rights,[94] and, on the other hand, an election to take the homestead divests the right to the distributive share[95] If the election is to take the homestead, by inclusion in the distributive share, such homestead is a continuation of the original homestead, and not a newly acquired homestead[96] A disposal of the homestead, within the above statute, is effected by a setting aside of the distributive share, and not by a mere election to take such share,[97] and therefore the survivor is not chargeable with rental on the homestead after such election, but before the setting off of the distributive share[98] The distributive share must be so set off as to include the dwelling house given by the law as a homestead, unless a different arrangement is preferred,[99] and property subject to such an election must have been occupied as a homestead by the deceased spouse at the time of his or her death,[1] and must be located within the state[2]

Seasonable election The survivor is not required to make the election immediately after the death of the other spouse but the choice may be made within a reasonable time,[3] and a delay may be excused where it is not due to any fault on the part of the survivor,[4] but, where property is left subject to administration, the survivor by neglect or failure to seek administration cannot prolong the term in which an election may be made[5]

Mode of election. While a written election is the most definite and certain method of exercising the right,[6] an election may nevertheless be manifested by unequivocal acts, words, and conduct.[7]

Evidence of election The right to a distributive share being a primary right, in the absence of evidence otherwise there is a presumption that the survivor has taken the distributive share,[8] and to overthrow such presumption it must be shown that there was an election to take the homestead[9] Ordinarily an election to take the homestead right is evidenced by the continued occupancy of the premises, although this is not conclusive, as the true nature of the occupancy must be determined from all the facts and circumstances,[10] to show such an election the occupancy must be such as is not only consistent with the homestead right, but it must be maintained under and because of such right[11] If the occupancy is continued by the survivor and family it raises the presumption that the survivor has elected to retain the homestead in lieu of the distributive share, which presumption will prevail,[12]

unless rebutted by proof of a contrary intention,[13] as where the survivor asserts some interest in the title other than, or inconsistent with, the mere life occupancy and use.[14]

Conveyance to children prior to election. The fact that the survivor quitclaims land of decedent to their children without their knowledge, with the idea that if he were going to keep the homestead he should deed the other property to his children, was not an election to take the homestead in lieu of a distributive share where within three months after administration was granted a formal written election to take the homestead was filed[15]

Election under mistaken belief An election made in ignorance of material facts is not binding, where no other person's rights have been affected,[16] nor is an intention to elect presumed if a person, although knowing the facts, acted in misapprehension of his legal rights and in ignorance of his obligation to make an election[17] An election by the survivor to take a homestead in lands under the mistaken belief as to the title thereto which terminated with decedent's death does not affect the survivor's rights in other lands purchased by the survivor during the marriage, or the rights of survivor's heirs[18]

Taking share in land in lieu of dower as not waiver of homestead Under a statute providing that the widow may take in lieu of dower the undivided third part in fee of the whole of the land, and that she shall be deemed to have so elected unless she commences proceedings for dower within a year after deceased's death, the fact that the widow applies for a one-third interest in fee simple in her deceased husband's property in lieu of dower raises no presumption of an election to waive her homestead rights where she was ignorant of her right to a homestead, no intention to relinquish it being shown and no rights of third persons having intervened Since this estate in fee simple applies to all the parcels of real property of the estate, while the exempt property of the estate which she is entitled to have set apart to her under the homestead laws is restricted to one particular parcel, the homestead, the doctrine of election does not apply, the two rights not being alternatives or substitutes[19] A widow's election to take a child's part in lieu of dower, as authorized by statute, does not affect her homestead rights in and to the homestead property,[20] notwithstanding the homestead rights exceed in value the interest in the lands which might have been assigned as dower[21]

Election between homestead and year's support. Under some statutes a widow is not entitled to a homestead and a year's support where the aggregate of the two provisions exceeds the amount which may be set apart as a homestead and exemption under the law[22] She may elect either to allow the homestead to remain for her benefit as the sole beneficiary, or to take a year's support out of the homestead property,[23] but if she enjoys the use of the homestead for a number of years after her husband's death she will be conclusively presumed to have elected to take the homestead, and cannot thereafter take a year's support[24]

Reason for rule

The fact that homestead rights of widow in realty exceeded value of one-third interest for life in lands belonging to deceased husband did not affect rights of widow to hold child's part and retain homestead rights in full, since, on election to take child's part, widow took fee-simple interest in the lands as that of a child, subject to homestead, notwithstanding all of realty was homestead property—Stanton v Leonard, supra

Statutory limit applicable only to dower

A statute providing that, if interest of widow in homestead shall equal or exceed one-third interest for and during her natural life in real estate of which head of family shall have died seized, no dower shall be assigned applies solely to dower and not to the estate which the widow may elect to take in lieu of dower, which is ordinarily referred to as "election dower"—Stanton v Leonard, supra

§ 253. —— Remarriage

The remarriage of a widow, under some statutes, does not forfeit her homestead estate by survivorship, even though she removes to the home of her second husband; but under other statutes a contrary rule obtains.

Under some statutes it is held that the widow may retain her homestead privileges only during widowhood [25] Under other statutes, however, a widow by remarrying does not lose her estate of homestead by survivorship,[26] and this rule has been applied whether the homestead was assigned to her before such marriage or afterward [27] Under some of these statutes it has also been held that the widow does not forfeit her homestead by a second marriage and removal to the home of her second husband,[28] even though she marries a nonresident and removes from the state [29] Under other statutes, however, it is held that the remarriage of a widow and her removal to the homestead of her second husband[30] or her removal to another state with her second husband[31] will operate as, or at least raise the presumption of, an abandonment of the homestead acquired by her from her first husband,[32] even though she continued in possession of the homestead of her first husband by tenant,[33] unless it is shown that the removal was intended to be merely temporary,[34] the burden being on the widow to show an unequivocal intention to return to the homestead left by her,[35] and, in the absence of evidence clearly showing such intention, the fact of her living on the property of her second husband would entitle her to maintain a claim of right to a homestead in his home [36]

A putative widow on remarriage loses any right she may have had to claim a widow's homestead in competition with the legal widow.[37]

§ 254. —— Alienation after Husband's Death

A widow's alienation of the homestead property, after the husband's death, under some statutes constitutes an abandonment of her homestead rights in the property, but under other statutes such an alienation does not affect the exempt character of the property.

Under some statutes alienation of the homestead property by a widow has been held not to constitute an abandonment by her of the exempt character of the property,[38] and a fortiori is this so where, at the time the widow joined in a sale of the homestead premises, she was ignorant of her rights

Evidence of intention to return held insufficient

A widow who on remarrying moved to homestead of her second husband was not entitled to a homestead in first husband's property sought to be partitioned, where whether widow would ever return to first homestead depended on future conditions or circumstances she left nothing in first homestead when she moved out, and there was no evidence of any agreement or present intention that widow and her second husband would ever return to her original homestead other than her statement that she expected to go back some time. —Rasmussen v Rasmussen, supra

in the homestead[39] However, under other statutes it is held that her homestead rights are lost to her by the attempted alienation,[40] as by a sale with no right of reclamation;[41] and it has been held that by joining with the heirs of the deceased husband in executing a mortgage of lands the widow estops herself to assert her homestead rights as against the mortgagee.[42] So a sale under the widow's mortgage of a community homestead divests her of her right of occupancy[43]

Where the sale of the property is conditional, the widow's homestead rights are not abandoned until the happening of the contingency constituting the conditions,[44] nor is there an abandonment where the widow conveys her interest in her husband's estate subject to her homestead rights,[45] or where the conveyance is made in consideration of the widow being kept by the grantee for the remainder of the widow's life,[46] nor are the homestead rights abandoned by a mere offer by the widow to sell the property[47]

Releasing other interests. There is no abandonment, it seems, where the widow executes a deed which releases her dower in the personalty[48] and her interest in the portion of the estate which would go to the executor,[49] or where she conveys an undivided interest, retaining the possession, use, and profits of the land,[50] or where she conveys a portion of her interest in oil and gas rights in the homestead premises,[51] but where, after the death of a testator, his widow executed a deed to the executor, releasing, remising, and quitclaiming all her right, title, and interest in the testator's estate, whether of dower or "otherwise," and all claims and demands against said estate, whether under the will or under the law, such deed passed the widow's right of homestead[52]

§ 255. Surviving Children or Heirs

Surviving children have no homestead rights by survivorship in the homestead of a deceased parent unless such rights are conferred by constitutional or statutory provisions.

Under the constitutional and statutory provisions in various jurisdictions, the homestead right continues in favor of the children[55] However, in some jurisdictions the homestead right of surviving children is greatly restricted or denied altogether, sometimes the right comes into existence only on the death of both parents[56]

Homestead right inuring to heirs of decedent see infra § 265 d.

Legitimate children. It has been held that the statutory provisions apply only to legitimate children.[62]

Grandchildren. While there is authority apparently to the contrary,[63] it is generally held that the term "children," as used in homestead provisions, is not broad enough to include grandchildren,[64] although they have always been supported by decedent as a part of the family.[65]

Children of second marriage. Where, under the statute, the homestead is continued for the benefit of decedent's widow and children, children of the widow's second marriage have no homestead rights in the property.[66]

§ 257. —— Extent and Limits of Rights

a In general
b Affected by acts of others
c Affected by their own acts
d Affected by curtesy or dower

a. In General

The extent and limits of the homestead rights of surviving children depend on the constitutional and statutory provisions.

Under homestead provisions giving the children a homestead right by survivorship, the homestead may survive on the death of either or both of the parent spouses,[67] but, as shown supra § 255, under some homestead laws it is necessary that both their parents shall be dead. In the absence of restrictions in the homestead laws, the children will be entitled to the benefit of the exemption, although there is no widow at the time of the death of the head of the family,[68] in which event the homestead is continued solely for their benefit,[69] and the fact that the children were not living with decedent at his death does not deprive them of their statutory right.[70] Barring limitations or restrictions in the constitutions or homestead statutes, the rights of the children are not affected by the fact that they own other property besides the homestead,[71] or by the fact that their parents did not apply for a homestead.[72]

Intestacy, indebtedness, and insolvency of decedent Under some statutes the children are not entitled to the exemption unless the father dies intestate,[73] and under others the children's right of homestead is dependent on the indebtedness[74] or insolvency[75] of the estate; but this is not so where the statutes contain no such limitation.[76]

Effect of divorce of parents The homestead right of the minor children is not in general affected by the divorce of the parents.[77] Where on divorce a wife was allowed the custody of her child and the benefit of her homestead, her death did not operate to destroy the homestead right of the child, who was entitled to such right until he should arrive of age.[78]

spouse. Where the surviving spouse and minor children each have a homestead right by survivorship, no distinct or independent right of occupancy exists in favor of the minor children as against the surviving spouse,[79] although, if both widow and children survive, the homestead should not be assigned to the widow alone.[80]

Effect of order vesting title in widow. The rights of minors during minority cannot be affected by an order of court assuming to vest title in the widow.[81]

b. Affected by Acts of Others

The homestead rights of surviving children ordinarily may not be prejudiced by the acts of the surviving spouse, by acts of their guardian, or by testamentary disposition.

Although the rule is otherwise in some jurisdictions,[82] the rights of surviving children in the homestead of a deceased parent cannot, under most homestead laws, be prejudiced by the acts of the surviving spouse.[83] Accordingly it has been held that the rights of the surviving children will not be prejudiced by the following acts of the surviving spouse: Abandonment of the homestead,[84] in which case the right to the entire homestead vests in the minor child or children,[85] neglect to claim homestead,[86] remarriage of the widow,[87] sale[88] or mortgage of the property,[89] although there is au-

In Tennessee
(1) The minor children are without any right to the homestead to which the widow, while living, is entitled, so that, where during the husband's lifetime the court was not asked in divorce proceedings to award to the wife the title to husband's homestead exemption her action bound children so far as right to homestead on father's death is concerned.—Carey v. (2) Under the Homestead Act of 1895, amending Rev.St.1889 § 5439, so as to define the rights of the children in the homestead as the joint right of the occupation with the widow until they reached their majority, and providing that on the widow's death or remarriage the homestead shall pass to the heirs of the husband, the rights of the minor children ceased on the termination of the widow's homestead rights by her remarriage.—C. The homestead rights of the surviving children are not affected by a widow's election to accept dower in lieu of homestead,[92] or to take a child's share of the husband's estate in lieu of dower[93] The widow's acceptance of, or a failure to renounce, the provisions of her husband's will does not deprive the children of their homestead rights,[94] although there is authority to the contrary[95]

Testamentary disposition as affecting rights of children While the rule has been materially limited or denied altogether in some jurisdictions,[96] generally the homesteader cannot, by will, deprive the children of the homestead rights bestowed on them by constitutional or statutory provisions[97] The homestead rights of the children are not affected by a will of the deceased owner containing a general clause directing payment of debts out of his estate[98] or by a devise made to them by the testator[99]

the homestead property at a foreclosure sale thereof[8] The guardian of a minor's estate cannot so deal therewith as to deprive the guardian of the minor's person of his right of occupancy of the homestead with the ward[9]

Acts of beneficiary other than surviving spouse The rights of surviving minor children in a homestead cannot be affected by the acts of beneficiaries other than the surviving spouse[10]

c. Affected by Their Own Acts

Surviving minor children usually are incapable of waiving or abandoning their homestead rights.

During minority the surviving children usually are incapable of waiving or abandoning their homestead rights by any act or declaration[11] They do not waive their rights by a temporary absence from the state,[12] nor are they barred by mere absence from the home place,[13] or by removal from the premises,[14] or by paying rent to the widow in ignorance of their rights[15] So children of decedent are not estopped from claiming an interest in so much of a homestead tract, occupied by the widow, as exceeds the statutory value of a homestead, although they have partitioned decedent's estate among them, except such home parcel,[16] neither are they barred by delaying, while minors, to assert a claim during the continuance of the widow's right or after its termination,[17] although lapse of time after the children have arrived at full age may prevent them from attacking a sale of the premises made under order of court by the surviving parent[18]

In some jurisdictions, it has been stated that the homestead may be abandoned by the children as well as by the widow,[19] at least in the case of adult children,[20] and on abandonment by one of several children, his share may be held for the payment of the debts of decedent.[21]

d. Affected by Curtesy or Dower

The homestead rights of minor children surviving their mother are superior to the father's curtesy, but are subject to the mother's dower where she survives the father.

The homestead rights of children after the mother's death have been held paramount to the father's curtesy during their minority[22] Where the husband predeceases the wife, the children take subject to the rights of the widow, whether of homestead or of dower[23] The right of minor children to hold as a homestead land of their deceased father until they become of age is superior to the title of a purchaser of the widow's dower.[24]

§ 258. —— Enforcement and Protection of Rights

Surviving minor children are protected in the enjoyment of the homestead.

Until their interest is legally terminated, surviving minor children are protected in the enjoyment of the homestead.[25] It has been held that minors have such rights in the homestead as can be enforced independently of the widow,[26] and that ejectment will lie in behalf of a minor to recover his homestead which has been wrongfully conveyed by his mother.[27] On the other hand, it has been held that the exemption cannot be secured by a defense to an action brought to set aside a conveyance made by decedent to his minor children as in fraud of creditors,[28] and it has been held that, although a debtor may claim exemption as against a purchaser of homestead property at a judicial sale under a decree against him, his surviving children have no such interest in the property as enables them to vindicate it by suit as a right of property,[29] nor do they possess such an interest in community property as enables them to redeem it from a foreclosure sale, where the law vests the whole title to such property in the surviving spouse.[30]

If a child asks that a foreclosure sale of an encumbered homestead, made to the widow, be set aside and title to one half decreed in him, the relief will not be granted unless such child contributes ratably to the payment of the encumbrance, which was discharged by the widow's purchase;[31] and, if the child sues after he is of age, having never been in possession of the property, and the premises were not a homestead when the debt in question was contracted nor thereafter, he cannot object to their sale on execution.[32]

Unless conferred by constitutional or statutory provisions, a surviving husband has no homestead right by survivorship.

Where the statute gives the surviving husband the right to continue to possess and occupy the homestead on the death of his wife, a right of homestead does not continue in favor of a surviving husband who had never possessed or occupied the homestead[40]

Void marriage The homestead right does not extend to one whose marriage to decedent was for any reason void[41]

Second husband. The statutes giving a right of homestead to a surviving husband usually do not give a homestead right to the second husband in the homestead acquired by the widow from her first husband, although the second husband lives with the widow on the homestead,[42] and although he acquires the remainder interests of the first husband's children[43]

Effect of ownership of other property. In the absence of constitutional or statutory limitations, the surviving husband is not deprived of homestead rights because of his ownership of other property[44]

§ 260. —— Waiver, Forfeiture, Release, or Estoppel

The homestead right of the surviving husband may be waived, forfeited, or released, or he may be estopped to assert such right

The surviving husband may waive, forfeit, or release his homestead right or be estopped to assert such right [48] It has been held that a surviving husband is not estopped to assert his homestead right either because he entered into a joint will with his wife in which his homestead right was not mentioned or by reason of having qualified as executor of her will,[49] and that a surviving husband does not waive any homestead rights by his silence and the inclusion of the land involved in his petition for letters of administration on his wife's estate and in his final report as a part of the assets thereof [50]

Separation from, or abandonment of, wife A husband's abandonment of his wife without cause or excuse, continuing until her death, forfeits, it has been held, all rights of homestead in the land which the wife owned at her death,[51] even though the property is community property[52] and the abandonment does not operate to sever marital relations [53] A separation of the husband and wife, although it may have continued until the death of the wife, will not constitute such an abandonment as to forfeit the right of homestead if such separation was by agreement, or excused or justified by the ill-treatment of the wife,[54] and the surviving husband's mistreatment of his wife causing her to leave the homestead is not a forfeiture of his rights where he continues to occupy the premises as his home [55]

Divorce Although divorced, a surviving husband may be entitled to a continuance of a homestead in the community property, even though the wife had remarried after the divorce [56]

Remarriage of the surviving husband does not, in the absence of a constitutional or statutory provision to the contrary, work a termination of his homestead rights [57]

The extent to which the homestead right of the surviving spouse acquired by survivorship takes precedence over other claims depends on the constitutional and statutory provisions in the particular jurisdiction.[58] The surviving spouse usually may occupy the homestead to the exclusion of a joint tenant or tenant in common,[59] and, as is shown infra §§ 262–264, the homestead right is usually paramount to ordinary claims against decedent's estate, to debts incurred by the survivor, and to the interest of the heirs of decedent As shown supra § 257 d, the homestead rights of surviving children are paramount to the curtesy of the husband but inferior to the widow's dower.

a. Debts Not Enforceable

The homestead rights of the survivors acquired by survivorship usually are paramount to ordinary claims against the estate of the decedent.

On the decease of a debtor, his survivors usually hold the homestead free from all ordinary claims against the estate[60] Exemption against claims of this character may be waived[61] and an undertaking given to pay these claims and a lien on the property given to secure them.[62]

Since the homestead continues exempt, it does not generally become an asset in the hands of the administrator, see Executors and Administrators § 115, or subject to his control,[63] and neither the administrator nor the probate court at its instance has any authority to diminish it[64] Even debts accruing in the course of administration are nonenforceable against the home place,[65] unless, as shown infra subdivision b of this section, such expenses are by statute made chargeable against the homestead in the hands of the survivors.

Liability of decedent as guardian In the absence of a statutory provision to the contrary, the homestead cannot be used to offset a liability of the ancestor as guardian and his surety for devastavit of the ward's estate, even though the guardian was the father of the wards, where the homestead continues to be used after the death of the ancestor by his widow and minor children, but, on the other hand, all property left by a guardian except the homestead descends to his heirs, charged with his debts, and should be used to offset any liability incurred by him[66]

b. Debts Enforceable

(1) In general
(2) Mortgage liens

(1) In General

The homestead rights of the survivors acquired by survivorship are inferior to the claims for which the homestead was liable during the lifetime of the decedent.

The homestead ordinarily is liable in the hands of the debtor's survivors for the same debts for which it could have been taken during his life,[67] and this is so although the survivor had no knowledge of the debts prior to the death of decedent[68] The survivors cannot claim any exemption which the decedent himself could not have claimed[69] Accordingly the homestead property in the hands of the survivors can be reached and subjected if the liability was contracted before the filing of a deed of homestead,[70] or before the homestead right otherwise attached,[71] or prior to the passage of the homestead statute[72] or acquisition of the premises by the debtor,[73] or before recording a declaration of homestead, where this is necessary under the homestead laws to the acquisition of a homestead,[74] or if the liability is for purchase money,[75] or on a judgment for a tort,[76] or for taxes which by the homestead laws are charged on the homestead,[77] or for obligations contracted in the raising of crops[78]

The survivors do not hold the homestead free of such debts of decedent's estate as are expressly excepted by the homestead law in cases where there is no other property in the estate sufficient to discharge them[79]

Fiduciary obligations of decedent Under some homestead provisions the homestead as against the survivors will be subjected to the payment of a debt due from decedent in his fiduciary capacity as trustee of an express trust, although it had not been reduced to judgment in his lifetime [80]

(2) Mortgage Liens

The homestead rights of the surviving spouse and children are inferior to a valid mortgage placed on the homestead during the lifetime of the decedent.

If a mortgage created an enforceable lien against the homestead during the lifetime of the mortgagor, it becomes paramount to the rights of his widow,[81] and the same rule has been held to apply with respect to the rights of the surviving children [82] If the administrator of the husband satisfies the mortgage from assets of the estate, the widow has a right to claim a homestead in the premises without making contribution [83] An heir of real estate, liable to sale for debts of deceased, who gives bond to the executor for payment of all debts against the estate and who, in performance of such obligation, takes an assignment of a mortgage constituting a valid lien against such property, cannot by foreclosure defeat the widow's right of homestead therein, assigned to her with his assent [84]

If the land is sold under a valid mortgage executed by the husband and the equity of redemption is afterward sold by the administrator of the mortgagor, the purchaser at the latter sale cannot buy in the title sold on foreclosure and bar the widow; but the latter may avail herself of her homestead right in the equity of redemption by contributing to the purchase of the title acquired on foreclosure [85] Where decedent devises to his widow, "her dower portion" in land including the homestead and the remainder to his children, the widow, as purchaser at the foreclosure sale, takes the property subject to the right of the children to participate in the benefits of her purchase by contributing within a reasonable time their share of the purchase money [86]

Resort to other property Under some homestead provisions the debt should be satisfied if possible out of the rest of the mortgagor's estate before resort is had to the homestead [87]

Foreclosure and rights incident thereto The holder of an enforceable mortgage must pursue his remedy by foreclosure,[88] and not ask the probate court to order, at the time of allotting the homestead, that it be taken subject to the mortgage lien,[89] but, under some homestead provisions, it seems that he may seek to enforce his claim in administration proceedings, and his failure to do so has been held to estop him thereafter to seek to enforce it [90] If the property is of greater value than the homestead and the mortgage combined, the widow is entitled to the surplus on the foreclosure sale of the property after the death of her husband after a deduction of the amount of the mortgage [91]

§ 263. —— Debts of Survivor

Under some statutes the homestead of the surviving spouse is exempt from his or her own debts

In some jurisdictions the rule is laid down that a homestead set apart under the Probate Act simply becomes not subject to administration, that is, not subject to claims of general creditors of the estate, but remains subject in the hands of the widow to the payment of her debts, whether contracted before or after it was so set apart [92] However, under some statutes, where a homestead has vested in the surviving husband or wife, it is not only exempt from the debts of the deceased spouse, but also from the debts of the survivor, whether the latter obligations were incurred prior or subsequent to the death of the former spouse,[93] and without regard to which spouse held the legal title to the property during their married life,[94] although it has been held that adult children may not claim and hold realty as a homestead exempt from sale for their own debts [95]

If the distributive share in the deceased's estate is set apart to the survivor in lieu of a homestead, his or her creditors cannot reach it [96] Where a widow has her distributive share of the husband's estate set apart to her out of the homestead, it is not liable for her debts contracted before the husband's death [97]

§ 264. —— Rights of Heirs and Remainderman

The homestead rights of the surviving spouse and minor children acquired by survivorship usually are superior to the rights of the heirs of the decedent.

Under the constitutional and statutory provisions of some states the rights of a widow obtained in the homestead by survivorship, see supra § 243, are paramount not only to the claims of the husband's creditors,[98] but also to those of his heirs as well [99]

The right of the husband to the homestead on the death of his wife, see supra § 259, has also been held to be superior to the interest of the wife's heirs,[1] and the rights of minor children are generally held to take precedence over the claims of the heirs.[2] The widow and remainderman cannot have a right of homestead in the same land at the same time, and her right to possession as against him is exclusive.[3]

Under some statutes, the widow's rights are superior to those of the heirs only if the estate is insolvent,[4] or if the estate is indebted,[5] or if the husband died intestate.[6]

§ 265. Nature of Estate or Interest Transmitted

a In general
b To surviving spouse and children
c To constituent member of family
d To heirs or issue
e. Incidental rights and liabilities

a. In General

Survivors of a homesteader take such estate or interest in the decedent's homestead as is given them by the homestead laws of the particular jurisdiction.

The nature, quality, and quantity of the estate or interest continued or transmitted by operation of law to those surviving a homesteader depend on the particular homestead provisions.[7]

Right of inheritance as distinct. The right or privilege of the surviving spouse or children to continue in possession after the homesteader's death is distinct from the rights of such person or persons as an heir or heirs.[8] A minor child who inherits the homestead has two separate and distinct estates in the homestead[9] existing at the same time and incapable of merger,[10] namely, homestead and inheritance,[11] one of which may be alienated and the other reserved.[12] The homestead right entitles him to entry at the death of his ancestor, and the inheritance right entitles him to entry at the time when he attains his majority.[13]

"Many of our cases deal with the immunity of the homestead to sale or disturbance under the claims of creditors. Such charitable protection is dictated by the same considerations which should exempt it from a similar calamity at the hands of the heirs. It is not conceivable that a disruption of the widow's use of the homestead as a haven or for subsistence could be less painful or distressing if accomplished at the hands of members of her own family"—Bohn v Bohn, 5 So 2d 429, 432, 193 Miss 122, appeal dismissed 62 S Ct 1283, 316 U S 646, 86 L Ed 1730

The nature of the estate or interest in the homestead transmitted to the surviving spouse depends on constitutional and statutory provisions, and under particular provisions may be a fee simple, a life estate, or a mere right of occupancy.

The nature of the estate a surviving spouse has in a homestead by survivorship depends entirely on the construction of constitutional and statutory provisions.[14] Under some homestead laws the surviving wife, or the surviving husband, or the surviving wife and the minor children if any, or the surviving husband and the minor children if any, as the case may be under the particular statutory provision, take absolutely all the estate or interest that was vested in the deceased homesteader in the homestead property at the time of his death, as under statutory provisions in Alabama,[15] in California,

(6) Where decedent estate was probably insolvent, so that homestead probably would have been wife's fee simple, under Code 1907 § 1196, and she also released life interest in another tract of land under agreement with administrator and heirs that the homestead and the other land should be sold and two thousand dollars paid to her, sum to be paid widow was to be hers absolutely and not merely for life—Matthews v Lovelady, 100 So 855, 211 Ala 495

In Texas, if a constituent member of the family survives after the death of the head of the family, the homestead is secured to the use of such survivor free from the general claims against the estate and debts of such survivor.

In Texas, under Const art 16 §§ 50–52 and the statutes, after the death of the head of the family, if a constituent member of the family survives, the homestead is secured to the use of such survivor as fully as it had been during the lifetime of decedent,[31] and passes to such survivor free from ordinary claims against the estate[32] and free from the debts of the survivor,[33] and, as shown infra subdivision d of this section, it remains exempt in the hands of the heirs after constituent members of the family cease to occupy it The homestead right inures only to such survivors as are embraced within the statute[34] If no constituent member of the family survives, the homestead becomes subject to decedent's debts, although he may have left children not constituent of the family.[35]

d. To Heirs or Issue

Homestead property descending to the heirs of the decedent is not exempt from the debts of the decedent unless the homestead exemption is continued in favor of the heirs by constitutional or statutory provisions.

Realty descending to heirs generally is liable for the debts of the ancestor, see Descent and Distribution §§ 116–138, and with respect to homestead realty this rule obtains where the homestead provisions or other statutes do not continue the exemption of the deceased homesteader in favor of his heirs[36] However, under the homestead laws of some jurisdictions, the homestead passes to the heirs exempt from the ancestor's debts, and, under others, from the antecedent debts of the heirs also[37]

In Florida, under Const. art 10 § 2, the homestead exemptions inure to the benefit of the widow and the heirs of the party entitled to such exemption free from the debts of the ancestor except those debts, if any, which are specified in the constitution as not being subject to homestead exemption [38]

The title of the heirs is derived from the laws of inheritance,[39] but the constitution annexes the incident that the homestead inheritance is free from liability from the debts of the ancestor.[40] Nothing inures to the heirs under the constitutional provision except an exemption from debts [41] The provision is applicable only when the estate of the owner in the homestead land does not terminate before or at his death [42] Where the property constituting the homestead is owned by the husband and wife as tenants by the entireties, on his death the whole title vests in the surviving wife and no homestead exemption inures to the heirs since they have no estate or interest in the property [43] The homestead property passing to the heirs of the husband on his death is subject to the widow's dower, and to her right to take a child's part and her quarantine right.[44]

The constitutional exemptions inure to the heirs and not to the children as such [45] The benefit of the provision is not limited to heirs who are minors or dependents[46] but inures to adult heirs as well as to minor heirs,[47] to nonresident heirs,[48] and to posthumous children as heirs,[49] and it accrues to the heirs notwithstanding the deceased head of the family had not resorted to the statutory method of defining and placing on record a description of the property which he intended should constitute his homestead [50]

The rights of the heirs are not affected by a mortgage[51] or by a devise[52] of the homestead property by the widow; nor are they affected by her election to take a child's share of her husband's tate in absence of showing of reliance to detriment of special administrator — Ringer v Byrne, supra estate in lieu of dower[53] The rights of heirs of the homestead owner are not affected by a conveyance of the homestead in which both parents did not join[54] On the death of the head of a family, the heirs are necessary parties to proceedings affecting the homestead[55]

In Iowa, where there is no surviving husband or wife, under the statute the homestead descends to the issue of either husband or wife according to the rules of descent unless otherwise directed by will and where it descends to such issue it is held by them exempt from any antecedent debts of their parents or their own, except those of the owner thereof contracted prior to its acquisition[56] The homestead property in the hands of the issue is exempt from the debts of the ancestor[57] and also from their own antecedent debts[58]

The statute is operative in favor of adult heirs[59] and of heirs who reside in another state[60] The exemption of the heirs is not because of any homestead right of their own, but is founded on the ancestor's homestead right[61] Where the homestead terminates before the death of the ancestor,[62] or the ancestor abandoned the homestead before his death,[63] the heir's exemption is lost The exemption as to the ancestor's debts does not include debts which might have been enforced against the homestead in the hands of the ancestor[64]

Where there is a surviving spouse the privilege of exemption of the homestead for liability for debts of the heir does not exist,[65] and the fact that the surviving spouse elects to take a distributive share does not affect the operation of this rule,[66] on the other hand, although the surviving spouse elects to take a distributive share instead of homestead, the homestead will descend to the heirs free from the debts of the ancestor,[67] and this is also the case where the surviving spouse loses or waives the right of occupancy or abandons the homestead[68] Where a homestead is transmitted by devise to one of several of testator's children, it has been held that the devisee is not entitled to an exemption as to his antecedent debts, under these circumstances the statute is not operative to give an exemption[69]

In Nebraska the statute vests the homestead in the surviving spouse for life and thereafter, in the absence of testamentary disposition, in decedent's heirs[70] Heirs include either direct or collateral heirs[71]

In the absence of a will the heirs take a vested remainder in fee, subject to the life estate of the surviving spouse, if any,[72] and exempt from any liability for the payment of debts existing against either the husband or wife at the time of his or her death except such as are specially provided for by statute,[73] and this right of the heirs is

e. Incidental Rights and Liabilities

(1) In general
(2) Rents and profits

(1) In General

A person occupying a homestead by survivorship has certain rights and liabilities, and where his interest is a life estate the rights and duties of a life tenant are usually conferred and imposed

The estate or interest of the survivor in the homestead usually carries with it such incidental rights as ordinarily accompany lawful possession or right to possession of the property.[83] He or she is entitled to the use and occupancy of the homestead,[84] and is entitled to use a right of way appurtenant thereto.[85] Where the surviving spouse uses the rents in paying a community debt constituting a lien on the homestead, he or she is entitled to reimbursement therefor out of the community estate.[86] The survivor may sue for breach of a covenant running with the land,[87] and has such an interest as will enable him or her to maintain trespass against one who wrongfully enters upon the premises,[88] or sue for injuries to his or her enjoyment of the property by any wrongdoer,[89] but a surviving wife is not a proper party to a suit begun by the husband and revived by his administrator, for damages in taking a part of the homestead for a right of way.[90] The survivor cannot defeat the rights of the heir.[91]

(1) A widow in possession of homestead is entitled to the use of the timber for necessary repairs.—Wood v. Wood, 157 S.W.2d 36, 203 Ark. 344

(2) However, as against the reversioners the widow may not make a sale of standing timber where it appears that such sale will injure the value of the freehold and is not essential to a legitimate use of the property for homestead purposes.—Smith v. Smith, 31 S.E. 135, 105 Ga. 106.

separate property;[2] and in some jurisdictions the constitution or statutes expressly vest the rents and profits of the homestead in the widow during her natural life or a portion of such rents during the minority of the children.[3] During the occupancy of the homestead the surviving spouse is not chargeable with rent for the use of the homestead,[4] and where he or she is excluded by the heirs from the homestead or a portion thereof the rental value may be recovered from them[5] or they may be compelled to account for the amount of rent collected by them.[6] Where the surviving husband collects rents from real estate after it has ceased to be his homestead, the only child of the marriage is entitled to his proportionate share thereof.[7]

Mining rights and royalties. Where the interest of a surviving spouse in the homestead is regarded as a life estate, the survivor may operate a mine on the premises which was opened during the lifetime of the deceased spouse, the right to operate may be exercised by the surviving spouse in person or through any other agency selected, including a lessee.[8] In the case of oil and gas, the surviving spouse, as a life tenant, is entitled as against the heirs and devisees to receive and collect absolutely the royalties arising from oil and gas wells developed under a lease executed prior to the death of the other spouse, and is not confined to the interest on such royalties,[9] but on abandon-

Pending election to take distributive share

(1) A surviving wife may enjoy the rents and profits accruing from the homestead from the time of her husband's death until her election between the homestead and a distributive share.—Cunningham v. Gamble, 10 N.W. 278, 57 Iowa 46.

(2) Election between homestead and distributive share see supra § 252.

Rental from property other than homestead

In order to compel a surviving husband to account for rents and profits the heirs must show that he had used and rented out more than the acreage allowed him by law as a homestead.—Roberts v. Roberts, Tex.Civ.App., 278 S.W. 937.

Decree assigning rents in lieu of dower

Where suit was filed by widow against deceased's daughter to have widow's dower and homestead set off in property, and circuit court took jurisdiction, and widow and daughter were fully heard on the issues, the court could properly enter a decree assigning to widow, in lieu of dower, one third of net rents and profits from property in question as a tenant in common with daughter, and the decree was not subject to collateral attack by daughter in widow's subsequent suit for an accounting for rents claimed under such decree.—Chapman v. (b) Rights of Children

The homestead right of the surviving children usually entitles them to share in the rents and profits of the homestead

The right given to the surviving minor children of joint occupancy of the homestead with the surviving parent, see supra § 255, usually entitles them to the rents and profits of the homestead, or a portion thereof,[12] but, as against the surviving parent, their right of joint occupancy does not entitle them to all the rents and profits [13] In some jurisdictions the constitution or statutes expressly provide that the children, during their minority, shall share with the widow in a certain portion of the rents and profits [14] Where the children are entitled

(2) However, it has been held that after minor beneficiaries have arrived at majority, they cannot maintain an action against one who wrongfully excluded them from the possession during their minority and took the rents and profits for his own use, their right as beneficiaries having become extinct by lapse of time, they have no claim as beneficiaries, and consequently no title, legal or equitable, on which they can recover — Moore v Peacock, 21 S E 114, 94 Ga 523

In Alabama

(1) Under Code 1907 §§ 4196, 4227, providing that the widow and minor children are to be equally benefited by the rents and profits of the homestead, if the family is a collective unit, as is nearly always the case, courts will presume a legislative intent that the rents and profits shall be collectively administered by the widow as natural guardian of the minor children, and in such a case a specific admeasurement and appropriation of shares is manifestly impracticable as well as inexpedient — Strong v Ford, 82 So 121 203 Ala. 110, 111—29 C J p 1008 note 6

(2) On the other hand, when the family is not an essential unit, as where one or more members are strangers in blood and in law to the widow, the situation is entirely to the rents and profits of the homestead, or a portion thereof, they may recover rent from a purchaser of the premises,[15] or from a devisee of land devised by the father who took and retained possession thereof, including land in which the minor children had a homestead.[16]

Where the minor children have no homestead right as against the surviving parent, they are not entitled to any of the rents, profits, or income from the homestead during occupancy by the surviving parent,[17] but they may under certain homestead provisions be entitled to the rents and profits during their minority on the death of the surviving parent,[18] unless the right to such rents and profits has been legally destroyed by the acts of such parent.[19]

Under lease from decedent If rents fall due after the father's death, they may be claimed by the children,[20] but if they repudiate the lease they can recover only the rental value of the premises, less necessary expenditures made by the lessee for repairs and taxes.[21]

§ 266. Property Subject to Appropriation, Nature, Amount, and Extent

The property subject to the survivor's homestead, the nature of the estate or interest of decedent, an allowance in lieu of homestead, and the extent and value of the homestead are discussed infra §§ 267–270. Property constituting the homestead generally is considered supra §§ 52–92.

§ 267. —— Property Subject to Appropriation

a In general
b Property used as family residence
c Property not impressed with homestead character during decedent's lifetime

a. In General

Unless otherwise provided by statute, the surviving spouse or children may claim as a homestead only such property as the decedent had selected or could have selected as a homestead.

Since their claim is a derivative one,[22] the rule is, except as it may be otherwise provided by statute, that on the death of a homesteader the surviving spouse, or the surviving spouse and children, as the case may be, under the right of survivorship, succeed to homestead rights only of decedent to which he was entitled at the time of death, and can claim as a homestead only such property as decedent had selected or which could have been selected as a homestead.[23]

changed and there is neither reason nor necessity for a collective consumption of the joint income, and accordingly where neither of the coexemptioners occupies the land and one of them is a stepchild, living, not with the widow, but with a guardian, the widow may be required to pay over to the stepchild his share of income from the property as it is collected by her —Strong v Ford, supra

Property not claimable. Applying the rule stated supra this subdivision note 23, it has been held that the survivor or survivors by reason of survivorship cannot claim or select a homestead out of property which decedent had never selected as a residence and which he had properly disposed of by will,[24] out of specific property in which decedent had lost homestead rights by removal and failure to claim as exempt,[25] or by otherwise abandoning it,[26] or out of property which decedent had conveyed in the manner prescribed by the homestead laws[27] Where a married woman borrows money for her separate use, and gives a mortgage therefor on her paraphernal property, she cannot afterward, on death of her husband, acquire a homestead right in the property to the prejudice of the mortgagee[28]

Property claimable. Under the rule stated supra this subdivision note 23, it has been held that the survivor or survivors may claim or select by right of survivorship a homestead in property purchased and occupied by decedent for a home,[29] although decedent may have left it temporarily on account of sickness,[30] in property occupied as a residence by the family and conveyed by decedent to his wife to avoid creditors, although never formally designated by him as a homestead,[31] in homestead property conveyed by decedent without consent of the spouse,[32] in property devised by a husband to his wife for life and in trust for their minor children,[33] in property rented in part to tenants,[34] or in property which had been set off to decedent during the lifetime of his former wife[35]

Title taken in daughter's name

Where a house adjoining the family home was acquired in 1909 and used in part by the family as their home, it became impressed with homestead character and exemption,

Thus it has been held that a homestead right may be enjoyed by a surviving spouse on property belonging to the separate estate of the deceased spouse[38] and that the surviving spouse succeeds to homestead rights in community property[39] If the husband and wife own contiguous tracts, both occupied as a homestead, with the dwelling on the latter's land, she may have a homestead right in the husband's tract on his death.[40] Property in the name of the wife but occupied as a homestead at the husband's death may continue to be impressed with the homestead character in favor of the surviving wife,[41] and a surviving wife may possess a homestead right in an estate held by the entirety[42] although it has been held that a widow is not entitled to a homestead in premises of which she was joint owner with her husband[43]

Minor children continue to enjoy the homestead, whether the land belonged to their deceased father or mother;[44] but it has been held that, where the property belonged to both parents, and a second wife obtained the husband's one half as alimony, the children of the first marriage were not to be entitled thereto as a homestead,[45] and also that, where surviving children have a homestead fixed and determined during the lifetime of their deceased parent on community property, they cannot secure an exemption in his separate estate[46]

Proceeds of sale of property In the absence of statutory authorization, the survivor or survivors cannot claim or select by reason of survivorship a homestead out of the proceeds of the sale of lands other than lands that had been or could have been selected by decedent as a homestead[47] Where the survivor voluntarily sells the homestead, the proceeds of the sale are not exempt[48] unless they are made exempt by statute,[49] but the proceeds are exand after destruction of the home by fire and the house was the sole dwelling place of the family its homestead character was unquestionable, even though the title in 1909 was taken in the name of an unmarried daughter and after the death of the mother the land was voluntarily partitioned by the father among three daughters reserving, however, the right to live with them, and exacting a contract for support from them for the remainder of his life — Hutchenrider v Smith Tex Com App 242 S W 204, reversing, Civ App, 228 S W 989

b. Property Used as Family Residence

Under some homestead provisions the property set apart to survivors must have been used by the decedent as a place of residence at his death

Except as it may be provided otherwise by statute,[54] the property set apart to survivors must have been used by decedent as a place of residence at the time of death,[55] at least in jurisdictions where use of the property as a family residence is necessary to the acquisition of a homestead, see supra §§ 32–41, 54, although it has been held that, if decedent had only a life estate in the portion on which the dwelling stood, the widow may claim a homestead in the remaining portion of the tract, owned by him in fee.[56]

c. Property Not Impressed with Homestead Character during Decedent's Lifetime

Unless required by statute, the property claimed by a survivor need not have been impressed with the homestead character during the decedent's lifetime

Under some homestead statutes the property claimed by a survivor must have been impressed with the homestead character during decedent's lifetime,[57] but under others this is unnecessary.[58]

§ 268. —— Nature of Estate, Ownership, or Interest of Decedent

Homestead rights may be acquired by the survivors only in property in which decedent had some interest or estate at the time of his death, although the estate need not have been a fee simple

"Seized" within meaning of statute

Under statute providing that, when any person dies "seized" of a homestead and leaving a widow or husband, such widow or husband shall be entitled to the homestead, the death of either husband or wife who has occupied a homestead does not destroy the homestead right in the survivor so long as the survivor resides upon the property, the word "seized" meaning the right of possession which inheres in both husband and wife in case of a home-

terest or estate at the time of death,[60] and that he should have had at least such an interest as could ordinarily be sold by his personal representative for the payment of debts.[61] Hence it has been held that a survivor succeeds to no homestead interest or right in property which decedent was merely holding adversely,[62] or as a tenant at will,[63] which decedent had conveyed reserving a mere right of occupancy,[64] which had been sold on execution before the death of the homesteader,[65] or which had been transmitted by inheritance to the children of a former wife;[66] nor does the survivor succeed to an interest in property in which decedent's estate is merely a remainder expectant on the death of his mother.[67]

Fee simple estate. It is not essential that the estate or interest of decedent should have been a fee simple.[68]

Equitable estate or interest. An equitable estate in decedent will support a claim of homestead in his survivors,[69] and it has been so held in respect of an equitable title acquired under a contract of purchase,[70] or the equity of redemption of mortgaged premises;[71] and the fact that only part of the purchase price under the contract of purchase had been paid at the time of decedent's death is immaterial.[72] However, if decedent had merely an equitable title under an executory contract for the purchase of land and his equitable estate thereunder had become extinguished, the survivor acquires no right of homestead in the land.[73]

Tenancy in common, partnership interest. If decedent was a tenant in common, his surviving children and his widow obtain rights of exemption in the property in jurisdictions in which a homestead may be acquired in property so held.[74]

No homestead by right of survivorship, it has been held, can be claimed in partnership property, at least while firm debts remain unpaid,[75] although in some jurisdictions a partner may acquire a business homestead in partnership property and the survivors take the property free of individual and firm debts.[76]

Leasehold estate. It has been held that a homestead can be claimed by a survivor in leasehold property,[77] although there is also authority to the

In Louisiana in the constitution of 1879 it was expressly provided that the benefit of the homestead exemption might be claimed by the surviving husband or wife or minor children of the deceased beneficiary and the same provision was retained in the constitutions of 1908 and 1913. Hence it follows that although, as a general rule, the owner of an undivided interest in property is not entitled to the homestead exemption, the surviving husband or wife of a deceased beneficiary is entitled to the benefit of the homestead exemption of community property by an express provision of the constitution.

§ 269. —— Allowance in Lieu of Homestead

a. In general
b From proceeds of sale of property
c From other lands

a. In General

Where practicable, an actual homestead in the original homesteader's land should be allotted for the use of the surviving spouse and minor children

From the very definition, nature, and purpose of a homestead, it is the policy of the homestead laws that an actual homestead in the original homesteader's land should be allotted for the use of the surviving spouse and minor children in every instance where practicable[81] Ordinarily, therefore, neither a money allowance[82] nor other land of decedent[83] will be given to the survivors in lieu of the homestead property of decedent, except where in the circumstances such homestead cannot be given to them,[84] or where there is some special statutory provision authorizing such procedure[85] and in any event great care should be exercised to protect their interests[86] Where an allowance is permitted in lieu of homestead, it should be made out of the debtor's entire estate rather than out of any specific property,[87] although it has been held that it may be made out of proceeds from the sale of real estate, other than the homestead, in the hands of a trustee in bankruptcy[88] A court of equity may decree a portion of the lands, which the widow is entitled to have allotted to her as homestead, in fee simple in lieu of such homestead where she and the adult heirs consent and it clearly appears that such action is to the manifest interest of the minors.[89]

b. From Proceeds of Sale of Property

The survivors ordinarily are entitled to the homestead rather than to the proceeds of a sale thereof

Under the rule stated supra subdivision a of this section, the homestead ordinarily cannot be taken away from a survivor entitled to it and the proceeds of a sale thereof substituted for it,[90] unless under some special statutory authorization the survivor may and does consent to such a proceeding[91] However, while the rule may be otherwise under some homestead provisions,[92] ordinarily where in the nature of things land cannot be set apart as a homestead to the survivors then the law will make provision for them in lieu thereof,[93] and in some

Where mortgage covered homestead and nonhomestead lands, the mortgagor's widow was entitled to have the equity of redemption in the entire encumbered property sold, and the proceeds not exceeding two thousand dollars decreed to her in lieu of her homestead, where it appeared that the homestead right would be of no value in excess of the encumbrances unless burden was imposed on other lands covered by the mort-jurisdictions it is so provided by statute [94] Under some statutes where the husband owned no homestead property, an allowance in money may be made the widow in lieu thereof,[95] but under other statutes no such allowance may be made where these circumstances exist [96] In some jurisdictions, apparently without reference to other statutes, it has been held that, where land allotted to the widow is of less value than the exemption fixed by statute, she will be entitled to have proceeds of the sale of other property of the estate to an amount sufficient to make up the shortage set apart to be invested for her benefit,[97] and that, where in the course of administration land of deceased is sold to pay his debts without the widow having made application to set off a homestead, the creditors will not be entitled to the entire fund but the court may grant an allowance to the widow out of the proceeds in lieu of homestead [98]

Tender of money or security for payment. In order to authorize the sale of the homestead property when it is indivisible, it is not necessary that the value of the homestead right be tendered to its owner before a sale can be made; it is sufficient if the payment is secured to be made from the proceeds of the sale before surrender of possession [99]

c. From Other Lands

Pursuant to statutory authorization, the homestead may be given to the survivors in other lands of the decedent

In the absence of statutory authorization the survivor or survivors by reason of survivorship ordinarily cannot claim or select a homestead out of decedent's lands other than lands which he had or could have claimed or selected as a homestead during his life [1] However, under some homestead provisions the homestead may under some circumstances be given in other lands of the decedent [2]

Particular property to be selected

In widow's proceeding to set aside homestead, widow was not entitled to have awarded to her husband's

Thus, if the homestead occupied by decedent was of no value to the widow because encumbered to the extent of its full value, she will be entitled to select from land owned by decedent at the time of his death a homestead exemption conforming in value, quality, quantum of interest, and duration of enjoyment to the exemption provided by law [3] Where a mortgage of the homestead is forbidden, the widow is entitled to the homestead property free from any claim of a mortgagee under such a mortgage, and cannot be permitted to take in lieu thereof a greater quantity of other land of her deceased husband, which pertained to the assets of his estate for the payment of his debts [4]

§ 270. —— Territorial Extent, Quantity of Interest, and Value

a In general
b Value

a. In General

Constitutional and statutory provisions control the extent and quantity of a survivor's homestead.

The privilege of survivorship is limited to one homestead for all [5] The survivor is entitled to the quantity permitted by constitutional or statutory provisions [6] but is entitled to no more than such provisions allow [7]

b. Value

The homestead of a survivor may not exceed in undivided one-seventh interest in tract of land which widow and husband occupied under a written lease notwithstanding husband owned the small undivided interest in land—In re Jones' Estate, 118 P 2d 951, 11 Wash 2d 254

Inclusion of household goods and furniture

Under statute providing that award of homestead to surviving spouse shall include the home and household goods if any failure to award widow household goods and furniture as a portion of the amount set off to her as homestead was error—In re Jones' Estate, supra

Setting aside lands to minor child

(1) Where mother dies leaving no homestead and lands are set aside to minor child or children in lieu of homestead, title to and interest in such lands vest in child or children to same extent as though lands constituted mother's homestead at her death—Worthy v Walton, 167 So 799, 232 Ala 317

(2) Where mother died seized of three contiguous lots with three houses thereon occupied by tenants, as her only realty, and property did not exceed one hundred and sixty acres in area nor two thousand dollars in value, minor daughter who was only heir at law was entitled to property in fee simple as exempt to daughter in lieu of homestead—Worthy v Walton, supra

Whole homestead

Under 58 St Annot § 311 the surviving spouse is entitled to possession of all of what constituted at time of death of spouse the constitutional homestead of deceased spouse exempted to such spouse in his lifetime as head of a family but such homestead may not be enlarged or another selected—Powell v Powell 116 P 2d 889, 189 Okl 255—In re Gardner's Estate, 250 P 490, 122 Okl 26

"Lot"

The term "lot" within a statute giving a widow a homestead right in the premises to the extent of the house and a quantity of ground on which the house is situated, not exceeding, in amount "one lot" is not to be understood as synonymous with "tract" or "parcel," but in the sense of a city town, or village lot according to the survey and plat of the city, town, or village in which the property is situated—Wilson v Proctor, 8 N W 830, 28 Minn 13

Ownership of other property as affecting interest of survivor

(1) Where the widow owned in her right one fourth of the tract of land, including the dwelling house and appurtenances, occupied by her husband as a homestead at his death, she is entitled under the statute, to land, including the dwelling house and appurtenances, worth one thousand dollars, as a homestead, but her own interest in the land allotted to her must be estimated as part of the exemption—Miles v Hall, 12 Bush, Ky, 105

(2) However, it has been held that, where the surviving wife, being head of a family, is in possession of community property as owner of an undivided one half and usufructuary of the other undivided one half, she is entitled to a homestead exemption of the whole property—Tinney v Vittur, 64 So 107, 131 La 549

(3) Under Const 1898 art 244, exempting a homestead, or two thousand dollars from the proceeds of a sale thereof, other property owned by the claimant of the homestead is not to be deducted from the two thousand dollars—Succession of Harrington 94 So 447, 152 La 927

Income from proceeds of homestead

(1) The exemption right of widow and children of homesteader, on homesteader's death in proceeds derived from sale of his homestead, under Kentucky statute, is limited to enjoyment of the income from the exempt fund, which must be invested under order of the court or otherwise so protected that creditors of homesteader can secure fund after right of widow and children in the income derived therefrom has been extinguished—In re Gibson, D C Ky, 33 F Supp 838

(2) Where the homestead is sold, infant children having a homestead right may, in the discretion of the court, be given the interest on the amount exempted, or the present cash value of their estate, or a reinvestment of the fund in a homestead for their benefit may be directed—Schnabel v Schnabel, 56 S W 983, 108 Ky 536, 22 Ky L 234 value the amount limited by constitutional or statutory provisions.

A survivor's homestead is not limited in value[8] unless a limitation is imposed by constitutional or statutory provisions.[9]

Time of valuation In determining the amount thus exempt, it has been held that the value at the debtor's death will control and not the value when the homestead was acquired,[10] although the contrary view also finds support[11] Where decedent failed to have his homestead assigned to him during his lifetime, the limits of the homestead estate and the value of the same, it has been held, must be determined in the proceeding for an allotment as of the present time.[12]

Matters considered in determining value. Improvements on the premises are not to be considered in determining the value of the survivor's homestead where improvements are expressly excluded by constitutional or statutory provisions[13] Improvements made by the surviving husband for his own use after his wife's death have been excluded in estimating the value of the homestead[14]

Insurance money collected on a dwelling burnt before the allotment cannot be included in determining the value of the homestead[15]

Encumbered property. In some jurisdictions if the homestead property is encumbered, the amount of such encumbrance is deducted in determining the value of the homestead.[16] Where the widow, entitled to a homestead, paid an encumbrance thereon created by her husband, the homestead should, for purposes of allotment, be valued on the basis of the difference between the value of the property and the encumbrance[17] If the property is worth more than both the statutory amount of exemption and the mortgage, and is sold to pay debts of decedent, the survivor's homestead interest need not contribute to discharging the mortgage[18]

Increase in value In some jurisdictions an increase in value of the homestead after allotment does not deprive the surviving spouse of any part of it[19]

§ 271. Duration and Termination of Right

The persons entitled to the fee in remainder may take possession of the homestead property on the termination of the homestead right of the survivors.

The homestead right of the survivor may be terminated in several ways, as discussed infra §§ 272-277 On the termination of the homestead of the survivors those persons entitled to the fee in remainder may take possession,[20] and, as shown infra, § 290, the homestead property is usually then subject to the debts of decedent.

§ 272. —— As Affected by Occupancy of Premises

Unless required by statute, the homestead right may be preserved without continued occupancy by the survivor.

Under the construction of some homestead provisions, continued occupation of residence on the premises is not required of the surviving spouse,[21] of the minor children,[22] or of heirs in whom the homestead laws vest the homestead estate free from the debts of the ancestor,[23] in order to continue the exemption from decedent's debts However, under the construction of other homestead provisions, the exempt character of decedent's homestead continues only so long as it is occupied by the surviving spouse [24]

Sufficiency of occupancy As regards sufficiency of occupancy when required, it has been held that a guardian,[25] or a guardian's tenant,[26] may occupy for the ward, and that a tenant may occupy for the surviving spouse and children,[27] although the surviving spouse may reside out of the state [28] The premises may be partly rented and partly used for cultivation and pasturage by the surviving spouse who resides elsewhere,[29] or the premises may be cultivated by a child who resides elsewhere,[30] or may, as it has been held, be used by the beneficiary merely for storage of furniture [31] Minor children for whom their guardian has thought it desirable to find other temporary quarters cannot be considered as having abandoned the homestead [32] An

a By surviving wife
b By surviving husband

a. By Surviving Wife

The homestead right of a widow acquired by survivorship may be lost by abandonment.

It is very generally held that the widow's right of homestead acquired by survivorship may be lost by abandonment,[34] although no question of an abandonment of a homestead can arise during a possession which was not referable to the homestead right [35] Abandonment is a question of intention[36] which may be shown by acts and conduct [37] Whether acts of a widow amounted to the abandonment of her homestead is ordinarily a question of fact[38] to be determined from all the circumstances [39] To constitute an abandonment, the surviving wife must remove from the homestead with intent not to return to it as a place of residence, or must, after removing therefrom, form such intention [40]

Permanent removal or absence Under many homestead laws a permanent removal by the widow operates as an abandonment of her homestead right in the premises,[41] and it has been held that the fact that she was ignorant of her homestead rights at the time of her removal will not prevent the loss of such rights,[42] but under other homestead laws permanent removal from the homestead premises will not work an abandonment of the homestead exemption,[43] at least where the title has become vested absolutely in the widow [44]

Short or temporary removal or absence. While the removal from a homestead for any length of time, however short, with a settled purpose to quit its occupancy and take up a domicile elsewhere, constitutes an abandonment,[45] an abandonment of the homestead premises sufficient to deprive the widow of her right to a homestead is not effected by mere temporary absence with intent to return[46] The widow may leave the homestead unoccupied indefinitely if she intends to and does return to occupy it[47]

Involuntary surrender of premises Abandonment must be predicated on a voluntary action of the widow[48] She cannot be charged with abandonment where she surrenders the premises under duress or is driven from her home[49]

Lease of homestead A mere temporary absence after having rented out the homestead and placed it in possession of the tenant has been held not to be such an abandonment as will forfeit the widow's claim to the homestead, and the occupancy of her tenant will be considered as her occupancy[50] However, where a widow rents the premises, and leaves them with no intention of returning and occupying them as a homestead, but with the intention of remaining away permanently, there is an abandonment[51] It has been held that a widow abandoned her rights in a homestead and exempt personalty by accepting a lease thereof from decedent's heirs, and subsequently conveying the property to them, canceling the lease, and accepting other provisions for her support[52]

Acquisition of new homestead. In the absence of a statute otherwise providing, the acquisition by the widow of a homestead in her own right, after the death of her husband does not constitute an abandonment of her husband's homestead[53]

Boarding relatives The fact that a widow who continues to reside on the homestead takes her son-in-law and family to board with her does not amount to an abandonment[54]

Nonpayment of taxes may be evidence of abandonment when coupled with other facts and circumstances showing the intention to abandon.[55]

A widow who becomes a nonresident under some homestead provisions loses her rights in the homestead[56]

Effect of abandonment In case of abandonment by the widow, including abandonment by alienation of the property, the person entitled to the fee may at once enforce his right thereto, unencumbered by the homestead[57]

b. By Surviving Husband

A surviving husband may abandon a homestead right acquired by survivorship

tion in favor of the surviving husband occurs by abandonment where he ceases to occupy the homestead premises and permanently makes his home elsewhere.[59] If he never lived on the premises and never asserted a claim thereto, and his wife devised it to adult children who were heads of families, the land is subject to her debts.[60] However, a mere temporary absence or removal from the premises by the surviving husband does not terminate his homestead right,[61] and it has been held that this is so, although he intended to return only in case he did not sell the premises.[62]

The homestead right of surviving minor children usually terminates as to each child on his attainment of majority.

Under most homestead laws the rights which a decedent's minor children hold in his homestead by survivorship continue as to each child until he reaches majority, but terminate at that period.[63] The benefit of the survivorship is not extended by the fact that the child who attains full age after the homesteader's death is a dependent female,[64] or an imbecile.[65] However, it has been held that, where several children are entitled to a homestead, a creditor cannot complain because those arriving at twenty-one years of age remain on the homestead with a younger child as this does not in any way affect or injure the rights of creditors.[66]

The rule under which the children's rights terminate on majority has no application in jurisdictions where the homestead laws pass the homestead property to the heirs exempt from the ancestor's debts, see supra § 265 d, or where a homestead right may be claimed by adult children, see supra § 256, or under homestead laws by which the homestead is "forever discharged from all debts of the decedent."[67]

§ 275. —— Marriage of Minor Children

The marriage of a minor child may terminate his homestead right acquired by survivorship.

A child who has married and established a separate domicile must be considered as having voluntarily parted with her right of occupancy.[68] Where the statutes provide that the unmarried infant children of a decedent shall be entitled to a joint occupancy until the youngest arrives at majority, a homestead right vested in an infant daughter is divested by her marriage during minority.[69]

§ 276. —— Death of Surviving Parent or Children

The homestead right of the surviving spouse terminates on his or her death, but the death of the surviving parent does not affect the homestead rights of minor children.

§ 277. —— Merger

General rules governing the merger of estates usually apply in the case of a survivor's homestead interest

General rules pertaining to merger of estates ordinarily apply in the case of homesteads acquired by survivorship[74] Where a surviving spouse acquires an absolute estate in the homestead property by reason of its being set apart as a year's support, the homestead interest of such spouse consisting of a life estate is merged into the fee[75]

If the right of a surviving spouse is a life estate and such spouse inherits a share from one of decedent's children, such share does not merge in her life estate[76] and may be reached by her creditors[77]

§ 278. Rights as Affected by Administrator's Sale

The interests of the survivors in the homestead of the decedent are not affected by an administrator's sale sale is by the court,[80] or is finally consummated and approved.[81] The purchaser at the administrator's sale buys at his peril and is bound to take notice of the rights of the survivors,[82] and if the sale proceeds without the widow's intervention, although she is enabled to intervene by statute, she may obtain a right of allotment from the avails of sale.[83]

If there is an excess above the size fixed by statute, and the property is sold by an administrator, but is subject to homestead exemption, the purchaser obtains title to the excess.[84] The purchaser of the premises at such sale, if they exceed the statutory valuation, may, it is held, become a tenant in common with the survivors who continue to own a homestead therein,[85] since the sale is presumed to have been made subject to the homestead right.[86]

a. In General

The statutes of the particular jurisdiction generally control the proceedings for the selection, setting apart, or protection of a survivor's homestead.

The applicable statutes of the particular jurisdiction generally control the proceedings for the selection, setting apart, or protection of a survivor's homestead rights.[87] However, since the homestead exemption of the surviving spouse or children is essentially the same as that of the decedent debtor, it has been held that the homestead may be selected and set apart to such survivor or survivors precisely as it would have been on application of the debtor.[88]

Selection by minor children It has been held that if both parents die without making a selection of homestead, the right to do so inures to the benefit of the minor children as being the owners of the homestead.[89]

As proceeding in rem Under some statutes a proceeding to have a survivor's homestead set apart is considered a proceeding in rem.[90]

Necessity for claim or demand Where the widow's right to a homestead exemption is considered personal to her, the right must be claimed and tested in a proper proceeding.[91]

It has been held that, while it may be the rule that adults in order to hold their homestead rights in the equity of redemption must make claim therefor prior to foreclosure, minors ordinarily are protected without such claim, for the reason that on the death of their father the statute vests in them a homestead estate in the equity of redemption during their minority.[92]

In some jurisdictions the survivor need not precede the filing of a petition for homestead by a demand of homestead, nor need the survivor then be in possession of any part of the premises.[93]

b. Necessity for Selection and Allotment

There is no uniformity with respect to the necessity of a selection or setting apart of the homestead in order that the survivor's right may attach thereto, the question being largely dependent on the statutes.

The homestead provisions of the particular jurisdiction in effect at the time of the decedent's death ordinarily determine whether or not a selection and setting apart of the homestead to which one may be entitled by right of survivorship is necessary.[94] Under some homestead provisions such action is considered essential to enable the survivor to secure the benefits of the homestead rights,[95] while under others it is not necessary.[96]

Area or value exceeding exemption limit. Generally, where the tract consists of a larger area, or is of greater value than can be claimed as exempt, selection and allotment of homestead to the survivors is necessary,[97] even where there is no express direction or provision of the statute for selecting the homestead by or for the widow or children.[98]

Area or value not in excess of limit. In some jurisdictions, where the area or value of a homestead which was occupied by decedent on his death does not exceed the limit allowed by law as exempt, and the homestead is not a part of a larger tract of land, no selection and setting apart thereof to the survivors is necessary to invest them with the homestead right in such property,[99] but all that is necessary is that the claim shall have been asserted or made known before the personal representative

Homestead not occupied

In construing homestead provision it has been held that in the absence of occupancy by decedent at the time of his death, judicial proceedings are necessary for the purpose of impressing the homestead character on the land not then so used and thus withdrawing it from administration—Hogan v Scott, 65 So 209, 186 Ala 310—Hall v Hall, 55 So 146, 171 Ala 618—Thocker v Morris, 52 So 73, 166 Ala 395

(2) Thus failure of probate court to set aside homestead divests children of no right—Cline v Niblo, Civ App, 286 S W 298, reversed on other grounds, Com App, 292 S W 178, modified on other grounds 8 S W 2d 633, 117 Tex 474, 66 A L R 916

(3) So the absence of an order setting apart the homestead for use of heirs does not affect rights of the heirs or exemption of the homestead from simple debts—Greene v Cass County State Bank, supra

(4) However, it has also been held that minor children have no homestead rights in any particular portion of the property of their deceased parent until it is set apart to them by order of court—White v Yates, Civ App, 85 S W 46

(5) So it has been held that the right of minor children to occupy the homestead on the death of both parents is not an absolute right but one which can be based only on an order of a court of competent jurisdiction in proceedings in which they are represented by their guardian—Osborn v Osborn, 13 S W 538, 76 Tex 494—29 C J p 1028 note 26

acquires dominion over it for the purposes of administration, or some creditor procures its sale before the payment of debts[1] In these circumstances it is said that the homestead is "unerringly designated by the law"[2] Nevertheless it is said that the proceedings authorized by law may be resorted to for the purpose of establishing the exempt character of the particular property by record evidence[3]

As affected by prior selection Under some statutes, if no homestead was selected and recorded during decedent's lifetime, it is the duty of the court to designate and set apart a homestead,[4] out of the community property, if any,[5] and, if not, out of the separate property of decedent[6] Under some of these statutes, if a married person has declared a homestead in community property prior to the death of the spouse, on such death the homestead right vests in the survivor without administration or an order setting it apart[7]

c. Proceedings in Which Right Asserted or Protected

The proceedings by or in which a survivor's homestead is set aside or the right protected depends on the statutes and practice of the particular jurisdiction.

The proceedings which may be instituted to set aside a survivor's homestead or in which such rights may be asserted or enforced are largely dependent on the statutes and practice of the particular jurisdiction[8] Aside from direct proceedings by petition or application for the setting apart of a homestead, discussed infra subdivision h of this section, and the assertion of the homestead rights in other proceedings, as considered in this subdivision this section, it has been held that the widow may assert her homestead rights by a bill in equity to have the homestead ascertained and set off to her,[9] by a bill in equity to quiet title to the homestead property,[10] by a bill in equity for subrogation to the rights of decedent who died pending an appeal in proceedings in which he had appealed for a homestead,[11] or by a bill to enjoin an execution sale of the property claimed as a homestead,[12] and under some homestead laws the widow may maintain an action at law as sole beneficiary under an existing homestead set apart to her husband, since deceased, to recover land set apart as a homestead[13] So it has been held that an injunction lies against the vendee of land to restrain ouster of the widow and children or one who occupied the land as a homestead under a contract of purchase from him[14]

Other proceedings Statutes prescribing a method for setting aside the homestead of a debtor during his life do not exclude other methods for setting apart the homestead of the widow after his death[15] By virtue of the provisions of the particular statute involved, it has been held that homestead rights of a widow may be asserted in her answer to a writ of entry to recover the land,[16] in proceedings on petition to sell the property to pay debts of the estate,[17] in an action to have the realty sold because of indivisibility and the proceeds distributed among the heirs,[18] by answer or counter-

Selection and description by widow
Where an administrator files petition to sell town lots for payment of debts, widow claiming homestead exemption in one acre of the tract is required to select and describe particular land claimed, and may not postpone such selection until final settlement of the estate —Meech v. claim in an action against the estate to enforce a claim and establish a lien against the realty claimed as a homestead,[19] by applying to the court, ordering a sale of decedent's lands, for payment of debts, and securing an allotment by the decree of sale,[20] or by her return of a proper schedule of decedent's property and record thereof [21]

Where a survivor refuses to surrender possession of premises claimed by him as a homestead and sold under a decree of court, his rights may be determined on confirmation of a report of sale of the premises [22]

Under a statute providing that, when a party as a tenant for life, or by the curtesy, or in dower, is entitled to the annual interest on a sum of money, or to the use of any estate, and is willing to accept a gross sum in lieu of the use, the sum shall be estimated in the manner therein provided, in a suit by a widow and minor son, the minor son's interest cannot be ascertained in land of which his mother, as widow, had a homestead, nor is the widow's interest in the proceeds of the homestead susceptible of ascertainment in such a suit [23]

Where a married woman served notice on the grantees of her husband in deeds executed immediately before his marriage in fraud of her marital rights that she would insist on such rights, the expenditure by the grantees of money in making improvements on the land did not affect her right to sue to set aside the conveyance as in fraud of her homestead rights, as the survivor of her husband.[24]

On partition of premises. Under the provisions of the particular statute involved, it has been held that a widow may assert her homestead rights by suit for partition where the whole value of the premises exceeds the homestead exemption,[25] or by her answer to a petition by the heirs for partition,[26] and that the court may arrest proceedings to partition a homestead among heirs until the interests of a minor are duly investigated and presented by his guardian [27]

If the property in which an exemption is asserted is to be partitioned, the homestead portion will be assigned to a surviving child of the homesteader, in preference to surviving grandchildren, unless such an assignment will result in such portion going to the creditors of the child, in which event the grandchildren are preferred to the surviving child [28]

d. Time for Proceedings; Laches

Apart from statutory limitations and principles of laches, the proceedings to set aside or protect or enforce a survivor's homestead ordinarily may be instituted at any time within the prescriptive period, or, in some cases, within a reasonable time Under some statutes the survivor's homestead may be applied for at any time before distribution of the property in a creditor's suit to subject such property to decedent's debts.

Unless the time for instituting the proceedings to set aside the survivor's homestead is fixed by statute, it may be commenced at any time within the prescriptive period [29] If application is made in

(1) Under the Alabama statute there is no time limit within which the proceeding may be instituted in the probate court where there has been no administration of decedent's estate, except that it cannot be instituted within sixty days of decedent's death —Davis v Bates, 194 So 647 239 Ala 214

(2) Thereunder the widow or minors may institute the proceedings within twenty years of decedent's death —Buchannon v Buchannon, 124 So 113, 220 Ala 72

(3) The widow may institute the proceedings for herself, although she had instituted no such proceedings during minority of the children —Buchannon v Buchannon, supra

(4) Where widow of owner of homestead, who died intestate, conveyed the homestead without taking steps to have it set apart as exempt, and the grantees reconveyed to the widow, the widow was authorized after the reconveyance to institute proceedings to have the homestead set apart as exempt —Davis v Bates, supra.

Time

For making claim to homestead generally see supra § 212

good faith and within a reasonable time, the fact that it is filed after a child has reached his majority does not defeat the surviving spouse's right to the homestead [30] It has been held that minors may assert their rights by application for allotment at any time before administration of the estate has been closed [31]

Before distribution of assets Under some statutes the survivor's right to a homestead may be applied for and obtained at any time before the distribution of the proceeds of decedent's property in an action by a creditor to subject such property to decedent's debts [32]

Laches Laches in asserting the homestead right may be a factor in determining a survivor's rights in equity [33] However, that a widow did not bring suit to quiet title to the homestead property for several years after discovering that deceased had pledged such property as security for a debt without her consent does not constitute laches barring the suit where she had at all times occupied the homestead and acted promptly to set aside the adverse claim when it was asserted of record [34] So the failure of the survivor to select the homestead and have it set apart before the filing of a creditors' suit does not of itself defeat the homestead exemption [35]

Assertion of claim by remainderman As the right of a remainderman to homestead is in abeyance during the continuance of the life tenancy, under principles discussed supra § 82, his right to a homestead in the property or in the proceeds thereof is not prejudiced by his failure to assert in any manner this right during the existence of the life tenancy [36] Furthermore, he is entitled to a reasonable time after the extinguishment of the life tenancy to assert his right to a homestead [37]

e. Jurisdiction

Jurisdiction of proceedings or actions to set apart a survivor's homestead or otherwise involving the enforcement or protection of such right is largely a matter of statute, jurisdiction frequently being in the probate courts, and often in courts of equity.

Jurisdiction of proceedings or suits in which the right of survivors to the homestead in decedent's property is involved is entirely a matter of statutory regulation [38] This jurisdiction is frequently vested by statute in courts of probate jurisdiction,[39] which

In Oregon
(1) Under Or Code 1930 §§ 3-205 and 11-402, the probate court has power to set aside the survivor's homestead —In re Dunlap's Estate, 87 P 2d 225, 161 Or 93—In re Pot-

jurisdiction, under some of the statutes, is special and limited, and hence can be exercised only with relation to questions and under circumstances as to which the statute contains special authorization [40]

Equity courts. In some jurisdictions under some circumstances the statutes vest chancery courts with jurisdiction over this class of proceedings or suits [41] In some of such jurisdictions equity may take jurisdiction of the proceedings if the remedy in the probate court is inadequate,[42] but not otherwise [43] After administration or final settlement of decedent's estate equity has been held to have jurisdiction to set aside the homestead for which no pro-

(2) Formerly, however, the probate court was held without power to set aside the homestead as separate property of the surviving spouse or minor children under a statute providing for the setting aside of exempt property generally in view of a statute dealing specifically with the descent of homestead property—Overland v Jackson, 275 P 21, 128 Or 455—In re Brizzolari's Estate, 275 P 17, 129 Or 307—Slattery v Newell, 236 P 268, 115 Or 22

In absence of administration

(1) Setting apart homestead exemption in probate court under some statutes is dependent on fact that more than specified number of days have elapsed after death of decedent, and there has been no administration of his estate—Dake v Inglis, 194 So 673, 239 Ala 241—Bryant v Perryman, 105 So 561, 213 Ala 561—29 C J p 1030 note 48 [a]

(3) Under such statutes a widow's withdrawal of proceedings commenced to set aside her homestead in deceased husband's land left the probate court without jurisdiction to determine right of exemption—Dake v Inglis supra

(4) Hence an order of a probate court authorizing complainant to withdraw her petition to set aside complainant's homestead in land of her deceased husband on complainant's payment of one half of the costs and which order recited that complainant consented to take a life estate in the land, did not "estop" complainant thereafter to bring a statutory quiet title proceeding against the deceased husband's collateral heirs and an alleged purchaser—Dake v Inglis, supra

Cancellation of purchase-money lien improper

Land incapable of allotment without sale

(1) Bill seeking settlement and distribution of estate showing no necessity for administration and alleging realty incapable of homestead allotment without a sale is sufficient to confer jurisdiction on equity—Quillen v Johns, 135 So 325, 223 Ala 198

(2) When a husband dies who is the owner of land occupied as a homestead exceeding the value of two thousand dollars and so situated that the dwelling house and the grounds on which it stands, to the value of the exemption, cannot be set aside, equity has jurisdiction, on application of the administrator, to sell the whole tract to pay debts, and out of the proceeds of the sale to direct investment of two thousand dollars during the life of the widow, the interest to be paid to her for life, and on her death the principal to descend as in case of other exemptions—Wardell v Wardell, 99 N W 674, 71 Neb 774

(3) In some jurisdictions where decedent's realty may be sold for reinvestment of proceeds in a homestead, see supra § 269, equity may take jurisdiction of a proceeding to accomplish such purpose—Casey v Sacks, 134 So 851, 223 Ala 147

The power of surviving widow to revoke agency of her son created under a compromise agreement concerning the dismissal of widow's first petition to have homestead set apart, and right of the widow to repudiate the agreement in advance of performance, and whatever equities if any, may have arisen from the entire transaction were not for the probate court in a subsequent proceeding to have homestead set apart to the widow but were matters for a court of equity—Patterson v Murphy, 9 So 2d 754, 243 Ala 267

Law courts. A circuit or other court as a court of law has been held to have no jurisdiction over the assignment of a homestead,[45] nor has such court jurisdiction over a dispute respecting title to land, where a conveyance by a deceased husband is attacked.[46] So it has been held that a district court has no jurisdiction to determine whether a widow's claim for an allowance in lieu of homestead is superior to a tax lien [47]

In an action against the estate in the district court to enforce a claim and establish a lien against the land for improvements, the court was held authorized to establish the claim and lien and to adjudicate the question whether the property was a homestead at the time of the improvement and when the lien was fixed [48]

f. Notice

While there are cases holding that notice of a proceeding to set aside a survivor's homestead should be given to all persons interested whose rights would be affected, where the proceedings are considered in rem ordinarily no such notice is necessary.

It has been held, sometimes by reason of statute, that all persons interested as owners of the fee, or beneficiaries of the homestead, or otherwise, should be given notice of a proceeding to set off a survivor's homestead affecting their rights [49] However, where proceedings to set apart the homestead are considered to be proceedings in rem, see supra subdivision a of this section, no such notice is held necessary [50] Thus, in the absence of a provision in the statute for special notice to creditors, no such notice is necessary in a proceeding in the probate court to set aside the homestead during the administration of the estate of which the creditors had the statutory notice [51] However, a notice to interested persons was held not necessary where the proceedings were instituted after the administration of the estate was closed [52]

g. Parties

In so far as applicable, general rules as to parties control in actions or proceedings involving the enforcement or protection of a survivor's right of homestead

The general rules as to parties, in so far as applicable and not changed by statute are controlling in proceedings involving the enforcement or protection of a survivor's homestead rights [53] Thus it has been held that the homestead cannot be set apart in an ejectment suit where all the parties interested are not before the court [54]

In an action to recover possession of land from which the beneficiaries of a homestead exemption have been unlawfully evicted, ordinarily the husband would be a proper party, but if he is dead and the exemption has ceased as to the children in existence, when the property was set aside by reason of death, marriage, or attainment of majority, but has not ceased as to a child born after the homestead was set apart, the widow for the use of herself and such after-born child, during its minority, may maintain the action.[55]

In a contest based on exceptions to the report of commissioners to set aside a survivor's homestead, a person not in interest is not a proper party [56]

Executor or administrator. Whether the personal representative of decedent is a necessary party to proceedings of this character will depend on the circumstances and the construction put on the particular statutory provisions involved.[57] Thus it has been held that, as a homestead is not subject to any rights of the administrator, he is not a necessary party to a bill by the widow to have homestead assigned and set off to her [58] However, it has also been held that the administrator, as the general representative of the estate, should be made a party to a proceeding by the widow to withdraw from the hands of the administrator and the control of the court a part of the property and to have it set apart as a homestead for the use of the widow and children [59]

Heirs or next of kin of decedent. Under some statutes the heirs or next of kin of a deceased husband are proper and necessary parties to the widow's suit to have land set apart to her absolutely in fee,[60] as in the case of a bill by the widow to have the estate declared insolvent for the purpose of raising her homestead from a life estate to a fee [61]

Minor children and guardian The guardian of minor children is usually the custodian of their interests[62] and as such entitled to assert their rights in the homestead of a deceased parent [63] Thus it has been held that minor children themselves cannot select, or seek to have set apart to them, the homestead,[64] but that this duty will devolve on their guardian under the superintending control of the probate or other competent court,[65] or that the court will do so in their behalf through commissioners appointed for that purpose [66] So it has been held that the minors' right of occupancy in the homestead where there is no surviving parent can be asserted only through a guardian, to whom the occupancy for the minor is assigned [67] It has also been held, however, that the guardian is not entitled, in behalf of his ward, to claim a sum ordered by the court to be paid by an administrator to the widow in lieu of homestead [68]

Under some statutes requiring notice to be given to interested persons, see supra subdivision f of this section, the minor children of decedent, as interested persons, may appear through a guardian, in opposition to an application to have the homestead set apart [69] It has also been held that, while minor children may be joined in a suit by the widow to enforce the homestead, they are not necessary parties.[70] Under some statutes, however, minor children must be represented by a guardian or guardian ad litem on the hearing of exceptions to the report of commissioners appointed to set apart the homestead [71]

h. Pleadings

Where proceedings to set apart or enforce a survivor's right of homestead are based on an application or petition, the right must be properly pleaded, and all jurisdictional elements and facts must be sufficiently set forth.

Under the statutes or practice of some jurisdictions the proceedings to set apart a survivor's homestead are instituted by an application or petition,[72] the filing of an application or petition being essential.[73] On the other hand, in some jurisdictions under the statutes, the probate court administering decedent's estate may of its own motion act to allot the widow's homestead, an application therefor being unnecessary[74] except where the procedure provided for in the absence of an application is ineffective to set aside the homestead.[75] An application is necessary, however, if no administration of decedent's estate is pending.[76]

If a survivor's homestead right is relied on either as a basis for the proceeding or action[77] or as a matter of defense[78] it must be properly pleaded, and, in order that the court may acquire jurisdiction of the proceedings to set apart the homestead, the petition or application must contain all the averments required by statute and must sufficiently allege the facts necessary to show petitioner's rights under the particular statute.[79]

i. Contest and Determination of Claim or Right

(1) Matters to be determined
(2) Evidence
(3) Trial or hearing, objections and exceptions

(1) Matters to Be Determined

The basic question for determination in a proceeding to set apart or enforce a survivor's homestead is the character of the property involved as a homestead and whether the area or value is within statutory limits. The rights of the several survivors must be considered

On application by survivors to have a homestead set apart, the real purpose being to separate the homestead lands from the land subject to administration,[81] the questions to be considered are whether the property was impressed with the homestead character at the time of decedent's death and whether the area or value of the premises is within the statutory limit [82] However, in allotting a widow's homestead, the rights of the children as well as the widow must be considered [83] The court may also consider and determine whether the homestead has been abandoned so as to make it subject to decedent's debts [84]

In a statutory proceeding by a surviving spouse for an award of property in lieu of a homestead, the failure of applicant to account, as the administrator of decedent's estate, cannot be considered [85]

Questions regarding the title to land are not involved and cannot be considered [86] Such questions can be determined only in an appropriate action brought at law [87]

Superior liens It has been held that the court cannot take cognizance of, or adjudicate on, liens on the land superior to the widow's homestead right [88]

(2) Evidence

(3) Trial or Hearing, Objections and Exceptions

All interested parties to the proceedings to set apart or protect a survivor's homestead are, under some statutes or practice, entitled to interpose objections and be heard. If the issues are heard by a jury, questions of fact are for its determination.

Under applicable statutes or practice, interested parties may interpose appropriate objections on the trial or hearing of a proceeding to set apart a survivor's homestead,[93] and all interested persons who have been given notice of the proceedings are entitled to be heard.[94]

The objecting party should, it is held, present his objections to the assignment of homestead and not delay until the premises are sold subject to the exemption,[95] but exceptions by creditors have been allowed to be filed after a return of the appraisers appointed to lay off the homestead.[96]

The objections should contain statements of fact and not conclusions respecting the excess in statutory value of the premises and the impossibility of carving a homestead from them;[97] and they should be written in language readily comprehended.[98]

Interrogatories. Under the practice of some jurisdictions, contestant may propound proper interrogatories to a petitioner who is seeking to have a homestead set apart, bearing on the right to the homestead.[99]

Questions for jury. Where the homestead right is involved in an action tried before a jury, fact questions involved are for determination by the jury.[1]

j. Duty to Allot

Under some statutes the court is under a duty to set apart the survivor's homestead on establishment of the right thereto; under others a discretion is vested in the court to allow or refuse an application under certain circumstances

Under some statutes when the right to a survivor's homestead has been established the court is under a duty to grant the application therefor and make an allotment in accordance with prevailing practice, the court having no discretion in the matter [2] Under other statutes a discretion is vested in the court under certain circumstances to allow or refuse the application [3]

Allotment subject to lien In some states it has been held that the widow's right to an allotment of homestead cannot be denied because of the existence of a judgment lien or mortgage on the premises, which, on enforcement, would be superior to the homestead claim, since it would still remain subject to the lien notwithstanding the allotment [4]

k. Method of Allotment

The method or manner of making the allotment of a survivor's homestead depends on the particular statutes involved Under some statutes it is accomplished by appraisers or commissioners appointed by the court In the absence of a specific statutory procedure the court may adopt an appropriate method conforming to the general purpose of the homestead law

If the statute does not point out the method of setting apart a homestead during the lives of husband and wife, on the death of either, the probate court may adopt its own method, conforming to the general purposes of the homestead act [5] So, if the statute provides no mode of selecting the homestead where none was selected during the life of decedent, the court may adopt a procedure substantially conforming to that which would have been followed during decedent's lifetime [6]

While the selection of a homestead for the survivors should be made primarily for their benefit,[7] yet it should also be laid off in such a manner as not to injure capriciously or arbitrarily others who may be interested [8]

Appraisers or commissioners Under the statutes of some jurisdictions the allotment of a survivor's homestead is made by appraisal by appraisers or commissioners appointed by the court to determine the extent and value of the property involved, and when necessary to admeasure and set out the homestead,[9] the particular procedure to be followed being determined by statute [10] Under such

Exclusion of excess
Under a statute requiring the appraisers to divide the property selected as the homestead so as to exclude the excess in value from the homestead unless they find that it cannot be done without material injury to the property, an order setting aside homestead is not void, notwithstanding the appraisers valued

a statute, if the property involved is found by the court to be less than the homestead exemption the appointment of a commissioner to admeasure and set out the homestead is unnecessary [11]

Where the report of the commissioners is ex parte it is not entitled to the same force and effect as the finding of a jury hearing the evidence of both parties [12] Exceptors to the report nevertheless have the burden of overcoming the findings thereof by clear and convincing evidence [13]

Property selected Under some of the statutes imposing an absolute duty on the court to select and set apart the survivor's homestead, the court has a discretion with respect to the particular property to be set apart, the wishes of applicant not being binding,[14] although the dwelling house should be included [15] If the land on which the house is located is insufficient in area to constitute the complete homestead permitted by the statute, adjoining land in quantity sufficient to complete the homestead may properly be designated as part of the homestead [16]

If two homesteads are claimed the court should require an election as to which of the two will be taken [17]

Mere irregularities. If the allotment proceedings are formally defective, through mere irregularities of procedure, this will not vitiate the assignment of the homestead [18]

1. Order or Decree; Findings

The order or decree setting apart a survivor's homestead should identify the parties, and a description of the property must appear therein or in other papers in the proceedings Findings must be supported by the pleadings and evidence.

The findings with respect to the survivor's right to the homestead must be supported by the pleadings and evidence [19]

The parties must be identified in the order setting apart the homestead,[20] but this may be done by referring to them as the "family" of decedent [21]

The order should not determine where the property shall vest on the termination of the homestead [22] It should not direct a sale of the remainder in the homestead to pay a balance of purchase money, but ought to provide for a sale of a part of the premises for that purpose,[23] nor can the court, if acting as a probate tribunal, decree that the homestead shall be subject to a certain mortgage,[24] or that the return of appraisers, assigning the homestead, shall be set aside unless a specified judgment against decedent is paid within a given time [25] The decree may, however, make provision for the payment of the excess of decedent's property over the homestead value to the personal representative, for the benefit of decedent's creditors [26]

26. Payment from proceeds of sale

Description of premises. A description of the land must be given in the order setting apart the homestead or in other papers in the proceeding or the order will be void [27] However, it has been held no objection to the allowance of the homestead that the order fails to define the boundary and extent of the premises necessary to reach the sum allowed by statute, and to find whether they can be divided [28]

Excess in value when property indivisible Where a homestead estate is decreed in homestead property which exceeds the statutory exemption in value and which is indivisible, the decree should show the amount of the excess in value and the fact that the property is indivisible [29]

Rent and damages Where a surviving husband entitled to the exclusive occupation of an unassignable homestead estate is excluded by the heirs from all parts of the house, except one room, and is mistreated, and put in fear, a decree awarding him the right to exclusive occupancy may award to him a fixed sum as rent for the time he was denied the use of the homestead, but should not award any damages for failure to assign his homestead estate [30]

Mere surplusage in the order will not vitiate it [31]

Notice of order In the absence of statute so requiring, it has been held that a widow applying to the probate court to have her homestead set apart is not entitled to notice of the court's action in approving the commissioner's report and setting out her homestead.[32]

The recording of the order setting apart a homestead is not necessary unless there is some statute requiring it [33]

The adjudication of homestead rights and the setting apart of a homestead generally are conclusive on parties in interest,[34] unless appealed from,[35] and where the proceedings are considered in rem, see supra § 279 a, the order setting apart the homestead is binding on the whole world [36]

Matters determined

(1) Where a probate court sets aside a widow's homestead, the decree is final as to whether deceased, at the time of his death owned the property, whether the lands were all the lands he owned at his death and whether they exceeded either in value or area the constitutional limit of a homestead whether the widow was in fact his widow, and whether decedent left surviving him any minor child or children—Jones v Hubbard, supra

(2) Under circumstances entitling the widow to an allotment of a fee, a probate decree alloting homestead of deceased to widow was an adjudication of all facts necessary to vest in widow the fee to the property including an adjudication that she left no minor child—Taylor v Dew, 184 So 184, 236 Ala 624

(3) Where, in ejectment by plaintiffs' curator, appointed under statute, during plaintiff's minority, the court found that the land in dispute was the homestead of plaintiffs' father, that it did not exceed the maximum value allowed by law for a homestead at the time of his death, and that his widow sold the land to third person, the judgment as to the value of the homestead and that such third person was the owner thereof in fee, subject to the interest of plaintiffs during minority, was within the jurisdiction of the court and was a final adjudication, although in so far as it attempted to exclude plaintiffs from possession of the land during their minority it was beyond the court's jurisdiction—Jennings v Cherry, 257 S W. 438, 301 Mo 321.

(4) Judicial allotment suffices to remove cloud on widow's homestead by virtue of will—Wood v Cantrell, 140 So 345, 224 Ala 294

Persons without interest

An aunt and uncle of a sole surviving infant daughter cannot complain of a judgment quieting title to the infant daughter's homestead to her grandfather on her death, and before any proceedings for the administration of her estate were had, since the aunt and uncle have no interest whatever in the homestead—Raistakka v Fagerstrom, 208 P 949, 64 Mont 173

Heirs without notice

Ala—Bedwell v. Dean, 132 So 20, 222 Ala. 276.

Creditors[37] and heirs[38] are concluded thereby

The widow, after acquiescence, is likewise prevented from disputing the allotment made to her[39]

A proceeding setting aside land in accordance with an order directing commissioners to do so is conclusive on the widow and those claiming under her as to title to land being in her husband[40] If common property, descending one half to the surviving spouse and one half to the children, is set apart to the widow as owner of the fee, she cannot deny a trusteeship of the children's half interest.[41]

Purchasers of homesteads, buying at a sheriff's sale and subject to an assignment of homestead already made, are bound thereby[42]

Abandonment An assignment to the widow is an adjudication that she has not lost her rights by abandonment up to that time[43]

Revaluation Where the homestead has been set off to the survivors, it cannot be revalued and a new homestead set off in the absence of special statutory authorization,[44] even though the value of the property set apart at a subsequent time exceeds the limit of the statutory exemption[45]

No publication of appointment of administrator The fact that an administrator did not publish notice of his appointment does not affect the conclusiveness of an order of the county court setting apart property covered by a trust deed to the children of decedent as their homestead, since all persons interested in the estate were required to take notice of the administration proceedings regularly begun, and the administrator's failure only renders him liable for any damages occasioned a creditor thereby, as provided by statute[46]

Unnecessary order Under circumstances rendering it unnecessary to set aside the homestead to the survivor, see supra § 279 b, an order of the probate court attempting to set apart the homestead is ineffective,[47] and, as discussed infra subdivision b of this section, serves only to withdraw the property from administration and further consideration

Matters not affected or determined. Liens existing against the property remain unaffected by setting it apart as a homestead[48] Where the order of court setting apart community property to a widow as a probate homestead was passed prior to a mortgage thereon being executed by the widow, but not entered until after the date of the mortgage, the validity of the mortgage is not affected[49] If the judgment recites the names of decedent's children and sets a homestead apart for the widow, it does not thereby adjudicate the children's interests or that they are minors[50] A setting apart does not determine that the widow may claim a distributive share in the homestead premises to be enjoyed by her in severalty[51] If she and the children are denied a homestead in land held by the deceased under a contract to purchase, they may renew their application after the purchase price has been fully paid[52]

Adjudication of title. The setting apart of a homestead to survivors does not adjudicate title to the premises or in any way affect title [53]

b. Withdrawing Property from Administration

An assignment or allotment of a survivor's homestead ordinarily withdraws the property from the administration of the decedent's estate

After a homestead has been set apart it is no longer subject to administration,[54] and cannot be sold in proceedings in the probate court for debts of decedent,[55] even though secured by a valid mortgage on the homestead,[56] or for the support of the family,[57] and such sales are absolutely void [58]

c. Collateral Attack

An order of a court having jurisdiction of the proceedings adjudicating a survivor's right of homestead is not subject to collateral attack except for fraud in the procurement of the order

If a court of competent jurisdiction adjudicates homestead rights, its judgment is not open to collateral attack[59] for mere irregularities,[60] but can be reviewed only by direct appeal therefrom [61] This is so even though the decree is based on a law subsequently declared unconstitutional,[62] or although error appears on the face of the decree [63] The rule

76 Cal—Wickersham v Comerford, 31 P 358, 96 Cal 433.

Mere lack of knowledge by the widow of the entry of the order setting apart her homestead is no ground for a separate suit to vacate the order without allegations of fraud in procurement of such order.[77] It has been held, however, that, where an order of the probate court is absolutely void, a bill in equity to vacate the order does not lie since the probate court may expunge the order.[78]

In an action to vacate a judgment setting apart a homestead, the probate court records of the proceedings in which the homestead was set apart should be received in evidence.[79]

Collateral attack on order setting aside. Where an allotment has been irregularly made under an order not absolutely void, a subsequent order setting aside the former cannot be collaterally attacked, if the court which sets it aside acts within its jurisdiction.[80]

§ 282. —— Review

The review of an order adjudicating a survivor's right of homestead or setting apart of such homestead is governed by the local statutes.

Under the statutes of some jurisdictions an appeal lies from an order or decree allowing and setting apart a homestead.[81] In such jurisdictions, it has been held, in conformity with the practice prevailing therein, that the appeal must be taken and perfected within the time limited by the statute[82] or it will be dismissed,[83] that such an order is not reviewable on appeal from a subsequent order,[84] and that an interlocutory order of a probate court which sets aside its own proceedings on the widow's petition for a homestead is not appealable.[85]

Scope of review and matters considered. As a rule errors not appearing on the face of the judgment roll are disregarded.[86] The reviewing court will not assume that a widow is not the head of a family where it is only shown that she has no children.[87]

On appeal a proper selection by the widow or commissioners will be presumed where there has been an allotment, occupancy by the widow, and no exceptions filed to the commissioners' report.[88]

The discretion of the court in limiting the period of the homestead will not be interfered with on appeal unless it is abused.[89]

Findings of fact by the court not clearly erroneous will not be disturbed.[90] Thus, if the ques-

Acts not constituting fraud

(1) Where a husband devised all his property to his wife for life with remainder to others, and the wife, in honest belief that she was the sole heir, began an action in the circuit court for the construction of the will, which was decided adversely to her, that decree did not prevent her from petitioning the county court for an order setting aside a homestead, and in her failure to inform the county court of the former proceeding there was no fraud.—Ferguson v. Holborn, 211 P. 953, 106 Or. 566

Sufficiency of evidence

Hubbard, 94 So. 167, 208 Ala. 269

(2) Evidence of inadequacy of price received for decedent's realty, sold for reinvestment of proceeds in homestead for widow and children, was held insufficient to raise presumption of fraud.—Casey v. Sacks, 134 So. 851, 223 Ala. 117

90. Value of property

(1) There is presumption on appeal in favor of finding of trial judge, who saw and heard witnesses, as to value of realty set apart to decedent's widow as homestead.—Hardy v. Morgan, 189 So. 878, 238 Ala. 251

(2) Thus, in proceeding to have homestead set aside to surviving widow of deceased, a finding that value of the property in question did not exceed statutory amount was not so clearly erroneous as to warrant disturbance of the finding.—Patterson v. Murphy, 9 So.2d 754, 243 Ala. 267.

tion of domicile is decided in the lower court and such finding is supported by the evidence, it will not be disturbed on appeal.[91] Where, however, the evidence leaves no room for doubt that the findings are erroneous, the appellate court must reverse the judgment based thereon.[92]

A reversal will not be ordered for error in findings of facts by commissioners, when the statute makes final the acceptance of their report by the trial court,[93] nor will an allowance to minors in lieu of a homestead be disturbed, if it is not shown that such allowance is insufficient for their support,[94] or an appraisal by commissioners, fixing the value of a widow's interest in the homestead at the full appraised value of the land,[95] or a refusal to allot a homestead to a minor within a few days of his majority, where it is not shown that the use for that period would have been beneficial to him[96]

On appeal to an intermediate court the time when debts of decedent were contracted may be shown by other evidence than the commissioners' report[97] An intermediate court did not err in refusing to order a reassignment of a single homestead to several children of decedent, where the only question before it was whether several homesteads could be allotted to the children respectively[98]

Certiorari. Notwithstanding the probate court's want of jurisdiction to sell a homestead during the minority of the children, it is not error on certiorari to refuse to quash an order confirming a sale of decedent's property, on the ground that part of the lands constitute the homestead of deceased, and that the sale was made during the minority of his child[99]

No particular description of the property is necessary on certiorari from proceedings in which the probate court failed to set apart a homestead for minors and order a sale of the land.[1]

On certiorari to a district court to correct an order of the probate court allotting homestead, a decree of the county court recognizing a rent contract as superior to the homestead claim cannot be pleaded in bar.[2]

§ 283. Protection of Rights by Redemption from Liens

The survivors are entitled to protect their rights in the homestead by redeeming it from liens or charges which may deprive them of the homestead.

The surviving wife and children are entitled to protect their right in the homestead by redeeming it from any lien or charge which threatens to deprive them of its shelter.[3]

§ 284. Transfer or Encumbrance

Under some statutes the court may authorize a sale of the survivor's homestead, as, for example, for the purpose of reinvestment, provided the statutory requirements are complied with Under other statutes a homestead in community property may be disposed of, like any other property, by the surviving spouse.

The transfer or encumbrance of the survivor's homestead by the surviving widow, widower, or children and heirs is considered infra §§ 285–287, and the transfer or encumbrance of a homestead generally supra §§ 123–156

Under some statutes the probate court may authorize the sale of a minor's homestead[4] The provisions of the statute as to the manner of conducting the sale must be complied with, however, or else such a sale will be void[5]

92. Value of property

Where evidence leaves no room for doubt that decedent's realty, set apart to his widow as homestead, by probate court's judgment, was worth more than two thousand dollars above amount of lien thereon at times of husband's death and commissioners' appraisal of property, supreme court must reverse such judgment—Hardy v Morgan, 189 So 875, 238 Ala 251

Procedure on reversal

On reversal of probate court's judgment, setting apart realty to decedent's widow as homestead, on ground that evidence showed conclusively that value thereof above amount of lien thereon exceeded two thousand dollars, supreme court may remand cause to probate court for appointment of commissioners to set aside and allot to widow so much of such realty as will not exceed such value in excess of encumbrance—Hardy v Morgan, supra

Under the statutes of some jurisdictions the homestead in community property may be disposed of, like any other property, by the surviving spouse [6]

By personal representative of decedent The homestead of the surviving spouse or minor child cannot be mortgaged by the administrator of decedent's estate,[7] even under authority of the probate court,[8] the homestead not being subject to administration proceedings until it is otherwise disposed of according to law.[9]

By trustee under will. Where the homestead passes directly to the heirs, as considered supra § 265, it cannot be mortgaged by the trustee under the will of decedent authorizing the trustee to mortgage the property [10] Such a mortgage is ineffective to create an equitable lien against the undivided interest of incompetent heirs and others of whose interests the mortgagee has constructive notice [11] The undivided interest of the trustee who was also an heir and obtained the benefits of the mortgage loan is subject to a lien for the amount of the mortgage indebtedness.[12]

Sale for reinvestment Under the statutes of some jurisdictions the homestead property may be sold on order of the court for purpose of reinvestment [13]

Some of these statutes provide that a homestead vesting absolutely in the widow and minor children cannot be sold by order of any court until the death of the widow and the attainment of majority by the youngest child, except for reinvestment, with the consent of the widow, if she is living [14] Under such a statute the homestead when set apart cannot be sold without the widow's consent,[15] even for reinvestment [16] Such a statute has been held to prevent the widow from selling or encumbering the homestead so as to affect the rights of the minor children,[17] but not to prevent the widow or children through proper court proceedings from selling or encumbering their interests [18]

§ 285. —— By Surviving Wife

The right of a surviving wife to transfer the homestead depends on the statutes of the particular jurisdiction

The right of a surviving wife to transfer or encumber the homestead depends on the homestead laws of the particular jurisdiction and nature of the survivor's estate or interest. Thus, under some statutes, as where the interest passing to the widow is a mere right of occupancy, the right being conditioned on continued occupancy, she has no such right or interest as may be conveyed or encumbered.[20] Such an attempted conveyance, as discussed supra § 254, operates as an abandonment or forfeiture of her rights, although, as discussed infra § 288, it confers no right or title on the grantee.

However, under the homestead laws of many jurisdictions, as where the widow's right in the homestead premises is not conditioned on continued occupancy, as considered supra § 272, it has been held that she may convey or encumber her right or interest in the homestead premises,[21] especially where she owns the property in her own right and not as widow,[22] although, as discussed supra § 257, such a conveyance or encumbrance will not be allowed to operate to the prejudice of the homestead rights of the surviving minor children. This right is in no way affected by a constitutional or statutory provision making a conveyance by the owner of a homestead invalid unless both husband and wife join in the conveyance,[23] since the statute has no application whatever to a conveyance by the surviving spouse,[24] nor is her right to convey such interest affected by a constitutional prohibition against partition of a homestead during the lifetime of the surviving husband and wife.[25] In some jurisdictions, where the right of the widow to convey or encum-

ber the homestead is recognized, it is held that the right cannot be exercised before the homestead has been set off according to law;[26] in others that, until the homestead has been duly set off, it cannot be conveyed except to the owner of the fee;[27] but in still others it has been held that the widow's interest in the homestead property may be transferred or encumbered before it has been set apart to her.[28]

Disposition by will. It has been held that, where the homestead has passed to the surviving widow in fee under decedent's will, she has power to devise it by will.[29]

The right of a surviving husband to transfer or encumber the homestead depends on the terms of the statutes of the particular jurisdiction.

Under the statutes of some jurisdictions, as where the right conferred on the surviving husband by the homestead laws is one merely of occupancy, the right is not of such a character as can be conveyed or encumbered,[30] and an attempted transfer operates as an abandonment of the homestead right.[31] Likewise, where he procures an unconditional sale and conveyance in a suit instituted for that purpose against the minor children, there is an abandonment of the homestead,[32] although an offer of the property for sale will not of itself have such effect.[33]

However, under the homestead laws of some jurisdictions, as where the right which passes to the surviving husband is greater than one of mere occupancy, he may mortgage or encumber the homestead property.[34]

Under the statutes of Illinois it was held that a surviving husband could not convey by deed to a third person his estate of homestead in premises, the fee of which was in the heirs of his wife before the homestead had been assigned or set off, so as to vest the grantee of the deed with the right to have the homestead set off and assigned to him[35]

Effect of transfer on right of exemption

(1) A surviving husband does not lose his homestead right or exemption by a sale of the homestead premises where the statute expressly provides that a disposal of exempt property, real or personal, shall not by disposal become liable for his debts—Bank of Myrtle v Garrison, 184 So 291, 183 Miss 526

(2) Under such a statute, the husband's homestead exemption was not lost by sale of his interest in homestead after wife's death and reconveyance of homestead to husband by purchaser on cancellation of notes and deed of trust given by purchaser, where husband was sixty years of age at wife's death, and homestead had been acquired by husband and wife and occupied as homestead and was less than one hundred sixty acres and of less value than three thousand dollars—Bank of Myrtle v Garrison, supra

(3) Proceeds of sale as subject to homestead right see supra § 267.

(5) Where decedent's son claimed a homestead in land which decedent who held record title thereto after death of his wife conveyed by deed of trust to secure a note, judgment of probate court allowing claim of holder of note and lien against land was not subject to "collateral attack" because of lack of jurisdiction of probate court over homestead, since only homestead involved in probate proceeding was that of decedent and constitutional limitation of power to mortgage a homestead does not apply to a widower—Thornton v Central Loan Co, Civ App, 164 S W 2d 248, error refused alienate their interest in the homestead depends on the statutes of the particular jurisdiction and the nature of the interest of such children or heirs.

Where the survivor has no power to alienate or encumber the homestead property, see supra § 284, minor children for whom a homestead has been set apart have no power to convey or encumber it [36] It is otherwise in jurisdictions where the homestead may be alienated or encumbered by the survivor, the minor child acting through his guardian in an authorized manner.[37]

Remainder. An heir of a homesteader may, even during the lifetime of the surviving spouse, convey his vested remainder in the homestead, where such surviving spouse is given only a life estate.[38]

§ 288. —— Rights Acquired by Grantee or Purchaser

The purchaser or encumbrancer of a survivor's interest in the homestead takes whatever interest the transferor had free from the ordinary debts of decedent. Where the right to alienate or encumber the homestead does not exist the transferee or encumbrancer takes nothing.

Where the homestead may be transferred or encumbered by a survivor, see supra §§ 284–287, the grantee or purchaser under a foreclosure of the encumbrance may take only such interest as the survivor possessed,[39] subject to the homestead rights of other survivors,[40] and free from all debts and liabilities of decedent,[41] except such as would have been enforceable against the homestead prior to such conveyance or encumbrance [42] If the homestead property has been lawfully encumbered by a mortgage or trust deed of the survivor, the holder thereof may enforce the same by appropriate action [43] Where, however, the homestead cannot be transferred or encumbered by a survivor, see supra §§ 284–287, the grantee or encumbrancer takes nothing [44]

§ 289. Liability of Homestead for Debts of Decedent

a In general
b. Devise or testamentary disposition as affecting rights of creditors

a. In General

Under some statutes the homestead passes to the beneficiaries free from the ordinary debts of the decedent under all circumstances.

Under some of the homestead laws, the homestead property passes to the beneficiaries exempt from the debts of decedent,[52] under all circumstances,[53] except such debts as are legally chargeable thereon during the lifetime of deceased.[54] On the other hand, as discussed infra § 290, in many jurisdictions the premises may be subjected to the claims of the creditors of decedent after termination of the homestead, which, as discussed infra § 291, may be done under some provisions by an involuntary sale subject to the homestead rights before the termination of the homestead, but under other provisions only after the termination of the homestead.

b. Devise or Testamentary Disposition as Affecting Rights of Creditors

A homesteader may usually devise the homestead property free from his ordinary debts, provided, in same jurisdictions, a survivor remains who is entitled to take and occupy the homestead.

Under the rule that a homesteader may dispose of the homestead property, as discussed supra § 123, and that such disposal by him is not a fraud on his creditors, as discussed in Fraudulent Conveyances § 31, he may make a testamentary disposition of the homestead free from liability for his debts,[55] except such debts as are otherwise chargeable against the homestead,[56] provided, in some jurisdictions, a survivor remains who is entitled to take and occupy the homestead.[57]

However, he may charge the devise with conditions such as the payment of debts and legacies,[58] and expenses of administration,[59] and funeral expenses,[60] subject, however, under some statutes to the widow's right of exemption if she elects to assert it.[61] A mere devise of the homestead, although permitted by statute, will not, in the absence of such special provision, have this effect.[62] To make the devise subject to the payment of the testator's debts, the language must be unequivocal and imperative.[63] Mere formal phrases or clauses will not suffice to charge the devised homestead with the debts of decedent.[64] In this category are mere general phrases directing the payment of the testator's debts, or the expenses of his last illness and funeral.[65]

Where a testator directs that after his debts are paid a certain sum shall go to his son, the legatee is entitled to such legacy out of the surplus remaining after the foreclosure of a mortgage on the homestead, as against a general creditor.[66]

This right to devise the homestead property free from the claims of decedent's creditors is restricted in some jurisdictions to devises to persons who would otherwise succeed to the homestead as survivors.[67] Thus, where the homestead right rests on the owner's status as head of the family under a statute giving a survivor's right to the homestead to the surviving spouse and children only, a homesteader without a spouse or children cannot devise the property free from the lien of a judgment creditor.[68]

Debts of life tenant. Under a will devising the homestead to the beneficiary "to have and to use during his lifetime and at his death after all indebtedness and funeral expenses are paid," the property to go to the residuary beneficiaries, the property passes subject to the debts and funeral expenses of the life tenant on his death, the provision for payment of the debts being a condition on the devise to the residuary beneficiaries[69]

Devise to wife or children While there is some contrary authority,[70] it is generally held that the husband may devise the homestead to the wife,[71] or to the wife and children,[72] or to the children where the wife does not survive the husband,[73] and the creditors have no right to complain;[74] and this view has been sustained against the objection that a devise constitutes an alienation within the meaning of a constitutional provision requiring the joint consent of the husband and wife to the alienation of a homestead.[75]

Under many statutes the homestead property becomes subject to decedent's debts on cessation of the homestead right of the survivors.

Under the provisions of most homestead laws, the rule is that, after the homestead exemption ceases in favor of survivors, the property reverts to decedent's estate and becomes subject to his debts,[76] as well as to the survivor's own debts,[77] the property becoming subject to debts accruing before or after the homestead was set apart,[78] and such a reverter occurs on abandonment of the homestead,[79] or on the death of the surviving spouse where there are no minor children,[80] or on the death of the sur-

Where estate was devised to testator's children in equal shares, so that estate would pass as if there had been no will, "worthier title" doctrine could not be applied so as to subject homestead to testator's debts created after he acquired homestead, since estate would be distributed in accordance with descent and distribution law —Luckenbill v Bates, 263 N W 811, 220 Iowa 871, 103 A L R 252

Presentation of claims against the estate of decedent, in conformity with the practice of the particular jurisdiction, as considered in Executors and Administrators § 394, is in some jurisdictions a condition precedent to the enforcement of payment against the homestead property.[82]

Statutes of limitation will not run against a judgment,[83] or fieri facias,[84] during the life of the homestead, although the length of time after administration was closed until the homestead right expired exceeded the time prescribed by limitations for the collection of the judgment, and the creditor did not ask to have administration suspended.[85]

§ 291. —— Sale Subject to Homestead Rights

Under some statutes the homestead may be sold to satisfy debts of decedent before termination of the survivor's homestead right, the sale being subject to such right. Under other statutes the property may not be so sold until termination of the rights of the survivors.

In many jurisdictions where the homestead may be subjected to the claims of the creditors of decedent, as considered supra § 290, the property cannot be sold before the termination of the homestead subject to the homestead rights of the beneficiaries therein, but can be sold only after the premises lose their homestead character,[86] the effect being to suspend the rights of the creditor until the homestead right of the widow and minor children ceases.[87] An order of sale prior to the termination of the homestead right is an absolute nullity in some jurisdictions,[88] although it is held that the purchaser at a void sale under such order will be subrogated to the rights of the creditors to the payment of whose claims the purchase money was appropriated.[89]

Laches. It has been held that no inflexible rule can be adopted by the courts fixing a time after the expiration of the homestead estate in which an application to sell real estate to pay debts must be made, but each case must be largely controlled by its own circumstances.[90]

Right to sell recognized. In some jurisdictions where the homestead may be subjected to the debts of decedent, a sale is permitted, if made subject to the rights of occupancy by survivors, such sale becoming effective when the exemption terminates.[91] Some of these statutes permit the sale of the prop-

Absence of claim to homestead.
In an action to settle an estate, it was not erroneous not to allow infant children a homestead where no claim for a homestead was set up for them, receipts from sale of realty plus other assets were insufficient to meet liabilities in full, and there was no showing in record which would have warranted the setting aside of the homestead for all of the children or those who might have been entitled to it.—Howard v. I. HOMICIDE IN GENERAL

§ 1. Definitions and Classification

Homicide is the killing of a human being. Some authorities limit the definition to a killing by another person, but others hold that it includes suicide and involuntary manslaughter committed by a corporation. Homicide may be hospiticide, hosticide, infanticide, regicide, or the like, depending on who the victim is.

Homicide has been defined as the killing of any human being[1] by a human being.[2] While the term is frequently defined as the killing of one human being by "another" human being,[3] it has been held that this definition is not entirely accurate or comprehensive[4] in so far as it excludes suicide[5] or cases of involuntary manslaughter by a corporation aggregate.[6] Homicide is sometimes defined by statute.[7]

Homicide may be lawful as well as unlawful,[8] intentional or unintentional,[9] felonious or nonfelonious.[10] Felonious or unlawful homicide is the killing of a human being without legal justification or excuse,[11] a killing committed intentionally, maliciously, or negligently,[12] and is either murder or manslaughter.[13] Nonfelonious homicide is either

Any living human being may be the subject of a felonious homicide, even though wounded or incurably diseased

Any human being may be the subject of a felonious homicide, including an idiot or lunatic,[29] a criminal,[30] an alien enemy confined in prison,[31] an unchaste wife,[32] a bad, quarrelsome, or brutal man,[33] a slave, see the C J S title Slaves § 8, also 58 C J p 759 notes 88, 89, and 29 C J p 1049 note 20, or an Indian, see the C J S title Indians § 75, also 29 C J p 1049 note 21

At common law an unborn child is not the subject of a homicide Although the infant ordinarily must have an independent existence, the presence or absence of respiration is not conclusive, and there is a conflict of authority as to the necessity of the umbilical cord being severed

An infant may be the subject of homicide,[37] but at common law, and except as the statutes may otherwise provide, it is necessary that the child be fully born,[38] and have an existence independent of its mother, and derive none of its power of living through any connection with her.[39] By statute, however, the killing of an unborn child is sometimes made manslaughter, see infra § 38, either in the first degree, see infra § 65, or in the second degree, see infra § 66

Ordinarily a child becomes fully born so as to be a subject of homicide when the body of the child has been completely delivered and an independent circulation established.[40] According to some authorities the umbilical cord must have been severed,[41] but according to others this is not necessary.[42] If the child is born alive it may be the subject of homicide although its death was caused by injuries inflicted before its birth.[43]

Respiration Ordinarily independent life may be shown by the fact that the child has breathed.[44] This test is not infallible, however,[45] and the fact that the child has breathed is not conclusive of independent life since children sometimes breathe before complete delivery and while placental circulation is still going on,[46] nor is the fact that the child has not breathed conclusive of an absence of independent life, since independent life may exist momentarily before perceptible breathing begins.[47]

§ 3. Capacity and Responsibility

One who was unconscious at the time of committing a homicide and who did not know what he was doing is not criminally responsible therefor

The capacity and responsibility for crimes in general are considered in Criminal Law § 55 The responsibility of infants for crimes is discussed in the C J S title Infants §§ 93–96, also 31 C J p 1094 note 76–p 1101 note 43; that of a married woman for her own crimes in the C J S title Husband and Wife §§ 221, 222, also 30 C J p 790 note 13–p 794 note 67, and that of a corporation for homicide in Corporations § 1364 b

If accused was temporarily unconscious so as not to know what he was doing when he committed the homicide he is not criminally responsible.[48]

a. In General

Insanity of the sufficient degree constitutes a defense to homicide, from whatever cause it originated, but the authorities are in conflict on the question whether mental incapacity can be such as to require acquittal of a higher grade of homicide and at the same time permit conviction of a lower degree

One who is so insane, at the time of the commission of a homicide, as to be incapable of acting with criminal intent cannot be held criminally responsible for his act,[49] and a statute providing that the insanity of accused at the time of the commission of a homicide shall not be a defense against an indictment for murder has been held unconstitutional.[50] It has been said that insanity on the part of the person committing a homicide does not in any degree alter the nature of the homicide as an unlawful act, but merely prevents punishment of the slayer [51]

The insanity required to exempt one from criminal responsibility for a homicide must be in the nature of a mental disease,[52] and cannot consist in mere stupidity or weakness of mind,[53] or mere mental depravity or so-called moral insanity,[54] at least if the slayer was aware of the nature and quality of his act, as discussed infra subdivision c of this section

Degree or grade of homicide It has been held by some authorities that insanity cannot be presented for the purpose of reducing the degree or grade of a homicide, that it must be such as to warrant acquittal of any degree or grade, and that it cannot be of such nature as to warrant acquittal of a higher degree or grade of homicide and at the same time permit conviction of a lower degree or grade [55] According to other authorities, however, the mental impairment of accused may be such as not entirely to relieve him of criminal responsibility and still such as to render him incapable of deliberation and premeditation, or of forming a particular intent, constituting a necessary element of a higher degree or grade of homicide,[56] and, as shown infra subdivision d of this section, it has been held that an irresistible impulse may reduce the offense to the grade of manslaughter

Cause of insanity One who is legally insane has been held exempt from criminal responsibility for homicide regardless of the cause of his condition,[57] as where his insanity was brought about by his continued use of intoxicating liquors, as discussed infra § 5 d, or by his own fault in yielding to anger or passion,[58] but, as shown infra subdivision f of this section, a state of frenzy produced by anger or similar passion does not of itself constitute legal insanity

Somnambulism has been classed with insanity as a defense and held not to constitute a defense other than that embraced in a plea of insanity,[59] and the responsibility of one who at the time of the commission of a homicide acted under the influence of such affliction is governed by the same rules as those which govern the responsibility of persons whose minds are impaired by mental disease [60]

In New Hampshire the existence of any definite test of insanity is denied, and it is held that the entire question of responsibility where the defense is insanity is one of fact, namely, whether accused had a mental disease having the effect of preventing the formation or entertainment of a criminal intent [61]

b. Time of Insanity

To constitute a defense, insanity must have existed at the time of the commission of the homicide, but if it did this is sufficient notwithstanding the accused was not insane for a long period and had lucid intervals at other times

To relieve one from responsibility for a homicide it must appear that he was insane at the time of its commission, and not merely prior or subsequent thereto [62] Thus one who suffers from intermittent insanity is fully responsible for a homicide committed during a lucid interval,[63] although if the homicide was committed during an insane interval he is not responsible if the insanity was then of the degree that would be recognized as a ground for acquittal if the insanity were habitual[64] In other words, however sane one may have been at all other times, if he was actually insane at the time he committed the homicide he is not responsible[65] His insanity need not have existed for any definite period, it is essential only that it existed at the precise moment when the homicide was committed[66] The fact that accused has, prior to the commission of the homicide, been adjudged insane, and has not been discharged as cured or adjudged to have been restored, is not conclusive of his state of mind at the time of the commission of the homicide[67]

c. Knowledge of Right and Wrong

Ability of the accused to distinguish right from wrong with respect to the homicide and to know the nature of the act is the most frequently applied test of sanity One who has such ability may be responsible although he is in some other respects abnormal

The test of mental capacity most frequently employed in determining the criminal responsibility of accused for homicide is the capacity to distinguish right from wrong as applied to the particular act, and to understand the nature, quality, and consequences of such act[68] Thus all of the courts are agreed that one who at the time of the commission of a homicide, by reason of mental disease, was incapable of knowing the nature and the quality of his act, or that the act was wrong, is not criminally responsible,[69] and, except in jurisdictions where incapacity by reason of mental disease to control one's action is recognized as a defense, see infra subdivision d of this section, it is generally considered that one who knows the nature and quality of his act and that it is wrong is criminally responsible[70] In jurisdictions in which the ability to distinguish between right and wrong is the test of insanity, one who is able so to distinguish is responsible notwithstanding he has a low intelligence quotient and a mental age far below his actual age,[71] or is weak-minded or feeble-minded,[72] or even a low grade moron not capable of understanding the nature of his acts and the consequence thereof so as to be relieved from responsibility —State v Macias, Ariz, 131 P 2d 810

suffers from some nervous disorder,[73] or has some mental defect which makes him more liable to yield to passion than if he were mentally sound,[74] or is otherwise mentally abnormal or defective[75]

d. Uncontrollable Action; Irresistible Impulse

In some jurisdictions, to render one suffering from mental disease responsible for homicide, he must have had the ability not only to distinguish right from wrong, but also to choose between them; but in other jurisdictions this doctrine does not obtain.

In many jurisdictions it is held that, although one committing a homicide had the capacity to distinguish between right and wrong as to his act, still he is not responsible if, by reason of mental disease he could not control his conduct, the view of these authorities being that the slayer is responsible if, and only if, he can choose between right and wrong in addition to being able to distinguish between them[76] In other jurisdictions, however, it is held that the irresistible or uncontrollable impulse doctrine does not prevail,[77] or at least is not available as a complete defense,[78] although it may reduce the offense to the grade of manslaughter,[79] and it is held that one who at the time of the commission of a homicide had sufficient mental capacity to know that his act was wrong is criminally responsible although his act was caused by an insane irresistible impulse,[80] and particularly is it held that a person capable of knowing the wrongfulness of his acts at the time of the commission of a homicide is not excused from criminal responsibility, even though he acted under the influence of an irresistible impulse produced by mental disease, in jurisdictions where there are statutory provisions to the effect that one is not excused from criminal responsibility on the ground of insanity, except where at the time of the commission of the alleged criminal act he had not sufficient mental capacity to know that his act was wrong[81] The courts are agreed that one who acted under the influence of an irresistible impulse produced by disease of the mind is not criminally responsible for a homicide, if, at the time of the commission of the act, such disease was sufficient to render him incapable of understanding the nature of his act or that it was wrong.[82] To excuse homicide the irresistible impulse must have been induced by a mental disease,[83] and not have resulted from mere moral obliquity or wicked propensities and habits[84]

e. Insane Delusions and Partial Insanity

An insane delusion, to excuse homicide, must be connected with the homicide, and one who is sane with respect to the homicide is not excused by the fact that as to other matters he is insane One suffering from insane delusions is not responsible, as a general rule, if the facts imagined would have excused the homicide, but the authorities conflict on whether he is responsible where the imagined facts, if true, would not have been an excuse

Partial insanity or insane delusion or hallucination is not sufficient of itself to avoid criminal responsibility for homicide,[85] there must be a connection between the homicide and the peculiar delusion under which accused was laboring,[86] and one who at the time of the commission of a homicide understood the nature and character of his act, and its consequences, knew that it was wrong, and was not impelled to its commission by an insane irresistible impulse, is not relieved from criminal responsibility by the fact that, as to other subjects, he may have been insane [87]

With respect to the question whether the homicide would have been justified or excusable had the facts with respect to which the delusion exists been real, the courts are agreed that one who at the time of the commission of a homicide was partially insane, that is, subject to delusions as to some matters, but in other respects sane, is not criminally responsible if the homicide would have been excusable or justifiable were the facts such as his delusion lead him to believe [88] The authorities are not agreed, however, as to the rule in cases where the delusion, even if true, would not justify or excuse the homicide According to some authorities the slayer is responsible where the imagined facts, if real, are not such as would justify or excuse the homicide,[89] other authorities adopt this rule with the proviso that the delusion must not be such as to render accused unable to distinguish between right and wrong,[90] and hold that an insane delusion which so corrupts the mental processes as to incapacitate the slayer from distinguishing between right and wrong with respect to the act constitutes a defense, although the imagined state of facts, if real, would not have justified a sane man in doing the same act [91] Further, there is considerable authority to the effect that cases of partial insanity are to be governed by the same rules that govern general insanity, and that the test to be applied is whether, as to the particular act in question, accused was capable of knowing right from wrong,[92] or, in those jurisdictions wherein the doctrine of insane irresistible impulse is accepted, see supra subdivision d of this section, whether he was capable of knowing right from wrong and of exercising the power to choose between them as to the particular act [93]

An insane delusion must be distinguished from the erroneous conclusion of a sane mind, which is no defense [94] It has been held that an insane delusion which does not entirely relieve accused from criminal responsibility may nevertheless create such passion and agitation as to warrant conviction for manslaughter only, and not for murder [95]

f. Anger and Emotional Insanity

Emotional frenzy which is unassociated with mental disease, such as anger, jealousy, or the like, does not excuse homicide

Emotional insanity which is not associated with mental disease does not absolve the person afflicted therewith of responsibility for homicide [96] Thus, if there is no mental disease, one who commits a homicide in a frenzy produced by anger, jealousy, or other like passion, although he may be unable to control himself, is fully responsible for the homicide,[97] particularly under statutes in effect so pro-

Will controlled by disease; stages of paranoia
The rule that the case should be considered as though the facts with respect to which the delusion exists were real does not apply to those cases in which the disease has advanced to such a stage that its victim is no longer able to control his will and actions with reference to the delusions, and hence, in the case of paranoia, the rule applies only where the disease is in its first or earliest stage of development, and not where the disease has progressed to its second or persecutory stage, or to subsequent stages —Woodall v State, 231 S W 186, 149 Ark 33—Hankins v State, 201 S W 832, 133 Ark 38 L R A 1918D, 784

§ 5. —— Intoxication

a In general
b Homicides requiring intent, deliberation, or premeditation
c Involuntary intoxication
d Intoxication coupled with insanity, delirium tremens

a. In General

The general rule is well settled that intoxication does not excuse a homicide for which no specific intent or malice is required, such as manslaughter or murder in the second degree. It may, however, according to some authorities, negative malice, or show that the homicide was committed as a result of provocation rather than of malice

At common law intoxication was no defense to homicide, particularly a homicide committed under such circumstances that malice would be inferred or imputed to the perpetrator if he had been sober at the time of the killing, and it could neither justify an acquittal nor reduce common-law murder to manslaughter[99] In accord with this doctrine the general rule is now well settled that if, the other attendant facts afford neither justification, excuse, nor mitigation, the mere fact of voluntary intoxication does not of itself excuse a homicide[1] for which no specific intent or malice is required,[2] or reduce the degree or grade of a homicide which would otherwise be murder[3] in the first degree[4] Particularly will intoxication not reduce the degree of murder where the distinction between a higher and lower degree of murder is made to depend, not on the intent, but on the manner in which the crime is committed, or the attending circumstances[5] Nevertheless, while voluntary intoxication does not excuse a homicide, it is generally held that the fact of drunkenness, although voluntary, may be considered in determining whether accused possessed the specific intent to kill or other mental state required to constitute a particular grade of homicide, see infra subdivision b of this section; and, as shown infra subdivision d of this section, a settled or permanent insanity resulting from continued intoxication constitutes a defense to the same extent as insanity produced by any other cause

5. Mass—Commonwealth v Gilbert, 42 N E 336, 165 Mass 45.
29 C J p 1058 note 96

According to the weight of authority, the fact that one, by reason of his previous habits, had dipsomania or such an appetite for intoxicating liquor as amounts to a disease overcoming his will and impelling him to drink is no excuse for a homicide committed while he was intoxicated.[6] The fact that by reason of constitutional infirmity, prior accident, or other cause one is more susceptible to the influence of intoxicating liquor than other men does not excuse him from criminal responsibility for a homicide committed under the influence of intoxication, if he has legal memory and discretion when sober and, knowing of the infirmity, voluntarily becomes intoxicated.[7] The fact that one committing a homicide was voluntarily intoxicated at the time of its commission does not aggravate the offense,[8] although there are expressions in some of the earlier cases indicating that the rule at common law was formerly otherwise.[9]

As defense to murder in the second degree Voluntary intoxication does not constitute a defense to a charge of murder in the second degree, or reduce murder in the second degree to manslaughter, at least in jurisdictions where intent to kill is not an essential element of murder in the second degree,[10] or, as the rule is sometimes expressed, as between murder in the second degree and manslaughter, drunkenness forms no legitimate matter of inquiry.[11] Voluntary intoxication does not of itself negative the malice required to constitute murder in the second degree and thereby reduce murder in the second degree to voluntary manslaughter.[12] The fact that overindulgence in alcoholic liquors has so affected one's judgment and intelligence as to cause him to be utterly reckless in doing acts endangering life does not reduce the grade of offense from murder in the second degree to manslaughter.[13]

As defense to charge of manslaughter At the utmost intoxication only extenuates a homicide from murder to manslaughter,[14] except as it may have resulted in a settled or fixed insanity, see infra subdivision d of this section. It is no defense to a charge of manslaughter,[15] voluntary[16] or involuntary,[17] or to manslaughter in either degree,[18] so that a homicide committed by one voluntarily intoxicated is manslaughter if the same act committed by a sober man would constitute such offense.[19]

Malice It has been held that intoxication may be considered on the question of the existence of malice or malice aforethought,[20] but it has also been held that the intention to drink may fully supply the place of malice aforethought.[21] Intoxication at the time the crime is committed, nothing else appearing, does not negative or repel malice.[22] Where to constitute any particular degree of murder implied malice only is required, the fact that the perpetrator was voluntarily intoxicated is not a defense as to that degree.[23]

Provocation. Where adequate provocation for the homicide existed, but it is uncertain whether accused acted under such influence or was actuated by prior malice, the fact of intoxication may be considered in determining whether he acted under the influence of the provocation rather than as a result of the malice [24] It is generally held that to reduce a homicide committed in sudden passion, on provocation received when accused was intoxicated, from murder to manslaughter, the provocation must have been legally adequate to reduce the grade of the crime if accused had been sober [25] There is, however, some authority to the contrary [26] If there was sufficient cooling time after adequate provocation the grade will not be reduced to manslaughter, although, because of intoxication, accused had not recovered from his passion [27]

Self-defense A homicide committed by one under the unjustifiable belief, due to voluntary intoxication, that his life was in danger, so that he was justified in killing deceased, is not on that account reduced to manslaughter [28] Where the question is whether the homicide was committed in self-defense or with malice aforethought, and it is shown that accused had attempted to kill deceased a short time before the final encounter, the fact that accused was intoxicated at the latter time may be considered on the question whether the intent to kill which was present at the time of the first encounter persisted and continued up to the time of the fatal encounter [29]

Aiding and abetting; conspiracy. On a prosecution for aiding and abetting in the commission of a murder, it may be shown that accused was so drunk as to be incapable of understanding what his codefendants were doing, for in such case he could not be guilty of aiding and abetting [30]

On a prosecution for conspiracy to murder it may be shown that accused was so drunk at the time the alleged conspiracy was entered into that he did not know what he was doing [31]

b. Homicides Requiring Intent, Deliberation, or Premeditation

(1) In general
(2) Extent of intoxication

(1) In General

While there is some authority to the contrary, the general rule is that intoxication may be asserted to negative the existence of deliberation, premeditation, or a specific intent, and may thus reduce the grade or degree of a homicide The rule is applied with caution, however, and is inapplicable where the slayer became intoxicated with the intent to carry out a preconceived design

Where deliberation and premeditation or a specific intent to kill is required as an essential element of a particular grade or degree of homicide, as in the case of murder in the first degree, the fact of intoxication may be considered in nearly all jurisdictions to determine whether the requisite intent, deliberation, or premeditation existed,[32] particularly under statutes in effect so providing,[33]

Affirmative defense
Where intoxication is relied on in connection with the rule stated in the text, it is an affirmative defense akin to the plea of insanity—State v Cureton, 11 S E 2d 469, 218 N C 491

33. N Y—People v Crumble, 35 N E 2d 634, 286 N Y 24

and to this extent drunkenness may reduce the degree of a homicide from murder in the first degree to murder in the second degree,[34] or, in some jurisdictions, from murder to manslaughter.[35] There is, however, authority which holds broadly that voluntary intoxication does not operate to reduce the degree of a homicide where the perpetrator was previously in the requisite condition of mental responsibility,[36] and that intoxication of accused is not a factor to be considered in determining the existence or absence of elements such as deliberation, premeditation, or intent to kill,[37] even though he was drunk to insensibility at the time of the commission of the offense,[38] or so intoxicated as to be temporarily insane.[39]

Becoming intoxicated with intent to carry out preconceived design The fact that one was so intoxicated at the time of the commission of a homicide as to be incapable of forming a specific intent to kill or of exercising deliberation and premeditation is not a defense to a grade of homicide of which such elements are essential if, prior to the commission of the crime, and before becoming so intoxicated, he had formed the requisite intent or had exercised the required deliberation and premeditation, and had become intoxicated for the purpose of carrying out his preconceived design.[40] It is otherwise, however, where his intoxication is unconnected with such design.[41]

Caution in applying rule In accord with the general rule in all criminal cases, see Criminal Law § 68 a, proof of intoxication of one guilty of a homicide, for the purpose of negativing the existence of the specific intent to kill or of the exercise of deliberation and premeditation required to constitute any particular grade of homicide, should be received with caution.[42]

(2) Extent of Intoxication

To warrant reduction of the grade or degree of homicide, intoxication must have been such that the accused was incapable of having, or at least did not have, the intent, deliberation, or premeditation required for the commission of the higher offense

The effect of intoxication on such questions as the existence of premeditation depends on the degree of intoxication and its effect on the mind and passion,[43] and the mere fact that one was intoxicated at the time of the commission of a homicide does not necessarily negative the existence of the required intent or deliberation and premeditation.[44] Where the grade or degree of homicide depends on the existence of a specific intent to kill or of deliberation and premeditation, it is generally held that the intoxication of the slayer, in order to render him guiltless of the higher degree, must have been so great and complete as to have made him utterly incapable of forming the intent or of acting with deliberation and premeditation,[45] and according to some authorities the degree of intoxication must have been such as to affect the slayer's power of reason and ability to understand the nature and consequence of his act[46] According to other authorities, however, the intoxication need not have been such as to deprive the slayer of all power of volition, or of all ability to form an intent or exercise deliberation and premeditation,[47] but merely such that the intent or deliberation and premeditation did not exist[48]

Involuntary intoxication brought about by force, fraud, or strategem of another constitutes a defense to homicide if it affected the mental capacity of the slayer to the proper extent.

The rule that drunkenness does not exempt one from criminal responsibility for a homicide does not apply to involuntary intoxication[49] In order to exempt one from criminal responsibility for a homicide, involuntary intoxication must be such as to render him incapable of discerning right from wrong and of controlling himself[50] Intoxication is not involuntary within this rule unless it is brought about against the will of the slayer, as where he is compelled to drink by force, fraud, or strategem of another, or takes liquor prescribed by a physician in good faith,[51] and it is not involuntary because of the fact that deceased furnished accused with intoxicating liquor or induced him to drink,[52] or because accused, by reason of his previous habits, had such an appetite for drink as amounted to a disease overcoming his will and impelling him to drink[53] Where one drinks of his own free will, the mere fact that he misjudges his own capacity or the intoxicating effect of the particular beverage will not render his intoxication involuntary[54]

d. Intoxication Coupled with Insanity; Delirium Tremens

Insanity combined with, or resulting from, intoxication is a defense to homicide if it is of a permanent nature and meets the test of insanity generally, but a mere temporary frenzy induced by intoxication is not a defense

Delirium tremens or mental disease of a permanent or settled nature amounting to insanity, produced by prior intoxication, is treated like other insanity, and is an absolute defense in a prosecution for homicide to the extent that insanity due to any other cause and of the same degree would be a defense,[55] and if such insanity actually existed it is immaterial that accused was or was not drunk at the time of the commission of the homicide[56] Insanity resulting from intoxication, in order to free one from responsibility for a homicide, must be of such degree as would render one irresponsible if the insanity were due to any other cause[57] Drunkenness alone, however, is not insanity,[58] to be an ab-

(2) Intoxication does not reduce an offense from murder to manslaughter unless it is so extreme as to suspend entirely the power of reason and render the slayer incapable of any mental action—People v Minzer 19 N E 370, 358 Ill 315

(3) Intoxication to be available as a defensive plea and to warrant a reduction of the degree of murder must be of such extent and degree as to deprive one of the powers of reason and render him incapable of appreciating the nature or quality of his acts and to deprive him of the ability to entertain malice or criminal intent or, in other words must amount virtually to insanity—Hall v Commonwealth 81 S W 2d 401, 258 Ky 744 solute defense the intoxication must have produced a fixed mental disease of some duration or permanence, and temporary alcoholic insanity, that is to say, the mental excitement or frenzy directly caused by voluntary excessive indulgence in intoxicating liquors, does not exempt one from responsibility for a homicide [59] As sometimes expressed, the mental disease must be the remote effect of intoxication, not the direct effect,[60] and must last after the immediate effects of the intoxication have passed away [61]

One who was insane from the combined effect of the use of intoxicating liquors and some other cause is not criminally responsible,[62] particularly if the other cause intervened after he had become intoxicated,[63] unless the direct, immediate, and primary cause of the insanity was the use of the intoxicating liquors [64] An insane person who became intoxicated and who at the time of committing a homicide was so insane from defect or disease of the mind as not to be responsible for his act does not lose his right to rely on his insanity as a defense by the fact that he became intoxicated,[65] although in such case his defense must be placed on the original insanity, and not on the subsequent drunkenness [66]

§ 6. —— Narcosis and Hypnosis

One who is insane from the use of drugs to the extent that he does not know what he is doing or that what he is doing is wrong has been held not responsible for homicide, but he is not relieved from responsibility by a mere temporary intoxication

Irresponsibility for crimes generally by reason of the use of narcotics or other drugs, or by reason of being under the influence of hypnotism, is considered in Criminal Law § 72 One who drinks what he thinks is whisky cannot avoid criminal responsibility for a homicide, in which the intent to kill is not a necessary element, by reason of the fact that the effect of the liquor which accused drank was of a nature contrary to the effect of whisky and crazed him to the extent that he did not know what he was doing, where the liquor produced a temporary besotted and unconscious condition but no disease of the mind, either permanent, temporary, or periodical [67] It has been held, however, that one who is insane from the use of morphine to such an extent that he does not know what he is doing or that what he is doing is wrong is not criminally responsible [68]

§ 7. Parties to Offenses

At common law parties to a homicide are divided into principals, either of the first or second degree, and accessaries, either before or after the fact In many jurisdictions, however, the distinctions between degrees of principals, and between accessaries before the fact and principals, have been abolished by statute

As in the case of other felonies, see Criminal Law § 81, and except as the distinctions have been modified or abrogated by statute, the participants in the commission of a homicide may be principals, either of the first or second degree, or accessaries, either before or after the fact [69] The actual perpetrator of the homicide is a principal in the first degree, see infra § 8, those who are present aiding and abetting him, but who do not actually perpetrate the homicide, are principals in the second degree, see infra § 9 a An accessary is one who, although in some way concerned with the homicide, was neither the direct perpetrator thereof nor present, either actually or constructively, at the time and place of the homicide,[70] if the accessary aided and abetted in the commission of the homicide he is an accessary before the fact, see infra § 9 a, if he first injected himself into the situation after the commission of the homicide he is an accessary after the fact, see infra § 10

In many jurisdictions there is no longer a distinction, with respect to homicide, between principals in the first and second degree[71] or between principals and accessaries before the fact,[72] and one who participates or aids and abets in the commission of a homicide is himself guilty of the homicide as a principal, see infra § 9 a

§ 8. —— Principals in First Degree

A principal in the first degree is one who actually perpetrates the homicide, either directly or through an innocent agent.

Principals in the first degree are those who actually perpetrate the homicide, those whose unlawful acts or omissions, without the intervention of any responsible agent, cause the death of the victims[73] Two persons may be the actual perpetrators of a homicide so as to render each a principal in the first degree[74] A person who causes a homicide to be committed through the instrumentality of an innocent agent is a principal in the first degree,[75] although he was not present at the time and place of the crime[76]

§ 9. —— Principals in Second Degree and Accessaries before the Fact

a In general
b Liability as affected by responsibility of actual perpetrator
c What constitutes participation
d Intent
e Common design

a. In General

A principal in the second degree is one who, although not directly causing death, is present, actually or constructively, aiding the commission of a homicide. An accessary before the fact is one who aids in the homicide but is not present thereat All such persons are held responsible as principals in jurisdictions wherein the distinction between principals and accessaries before the fact has been abolished.

Principals in the second degree in the commission of a homicide are those who are present, actually or constructively, at the time and place of its commission, aiding and abetting or otherwise participating therein, but not directly causing the death[77] An accessary before the fact in the commission of a homicide is one who was not present either actually or constructively at the time and place of its commission, but who counseled, procured, instigated, or commanded the actual perpetrator to commit the offense, or otherwise assisted therein[78]

In many jurisdictions the distinction between principals and accessaries, or between principals in the first and second degree, has been abolished by statute, see supra § 7, and the general rule is that one who participates or aids and abets in the commission of a homicide is himself guilty of the homicide[79] as a principal, to be indicted, tried, and punished as such,[80] regardless whether or not he fired

In the Philippines

(1) Where murder is committed by one person acting under the influence and guidance of others, the actual slayer is guilty as an author by direct participation, and the others who planned the crimes are guilty as authors by inducement—People v Astad, 55 Philippine 697

the fatal shot or struck the fatal blow.[81]

In jurisdictions in which the distinction between principals and accessaries before the fact has not been abolished, an accessary before the fact is guilty of a crime distinct from that of principal in the murder,[82] such accessary cannot be convicted of murder[83] as a principal,[84] nor can the actual murderer be convicted of being an accessary before the fact.[85] In such jurisdictions one may by separate acts be both an accessary before the fact and a principal in the second degree to the same murder.[86]

Consummation of killing The crime of an accessary before the fact to a homicide is not complete until the killing is consummated, and if the killing has not taken place one cannot be held responsible for having counseled or procured the commission of a homicide, notwithstanding the existence of statutes abolishing the distinction between accessaries before the fact and principals.[87]

Presence Although at one time those who were present aiding and abetting were called accessaries at the fact and were treated as accessaries,[88] it is now well settled that all who were present aiding and abetting in the commission of a homicide are principals,[89] and one cannot be charged as an accessary before the fact in the commission of a homicide if he was present either actually or constructively at the time of its commission.[90] At common law, and in a jurisdiction where the common-law rule has not been changed by statute, in order to render one a principal in the second degree, his presence, either actual or constructive, at the time and place of the homicide is essential,[91] and, in a jurisdiction in which a distinction is made between principals, accomplices, and accessaries, one who was not present at the scene of the homicide and who was not doing anything at the time in aid of a common design cannot be convicted as a principal, notwithstanding the proof may be sufficient to show that he was an accomplice or an accessary.[92] Under statutes, however, particularly statutes abolishing the distinction between accessaries before the fact and principals, see supra § 7, one who has aided and abetted a homicide may be held guilty of the homicide[93] as a principal,[94] although not present at its commission, and, as shown infra subdivision e of this section, presence is not required in the case of one who has participated in a common design to commit an unlawful act.

One who aids or abets the commission of a homicide is criminally responsible therefor, as, for example, as a "principal" or a "principal in the second degree," if he is constructively present at the homicide.[95] One is deemed to be constructively

Constructive presence generally see Criminal Law § 86 b.

Standing by, within sight or hearing

The presence required to constitute one a principal in the second degree need not, where the statutes in effect so provide, be actual standing by, present at the time and place of the commission of a homicide where he is at the time performing any act in furtherance of the commission of the homicide,[96] such as keeping watch[97] or signaling,[98] or is so situated as to make his personal assistance in the commission thereof available[99] Conversely, to be constructively present as an aider or abettor one must be in such contiguity as to enable him actually to render aid in the commission of the homicide or in escaping thereafter,[1] and the mere fact that one is a party to a conspiracy to commit a homicide does not show constructive presence[2]

b. Liability as Affected by Responsibility of Actual Perpetrator

Where several persons participate in a homicide with the same state of mind, all are equally guilty, but where malice or premeditation exists on the part of one, and not the others, each may be guilty of a different degree or grade of homicide A personal incapacity such as youth, which renders the actual perpetrator not guilty, or guilty in some lesser degree, does not excuse one who assists him

One acting as an accessary before the fact or principal in the second degree may be punished, although the perpetrator of the homicide is not punishable or is punishable only in a more limited degree by reason of his youth[3] or other incapacity[4] So, although the principal is a corporation which is not subject to the punishment by imprisonment imposed by the statute defining the offense, nevertheless individuals who aid and abet the corporation may be punished[5] On the other hand, where the killing was done under such circumstances that the actual perpetrator was not guilty of murder or manslaughter, one who participated with him therein is not guilty, either as a principal in the second degree or as an accessary before the fact[6] Thus if the actual perpetrator was acting in necessary self-defense, one who aided or assisted him in killing deceased is not criminally responsible[7]

One who aids in the commission of a homicide is, in the absence of circumstances showing an intent, purpose, or mental capacity on his part different from that of the actual slayer, guilty equally with,[8] and of the same degree or grade of homicide as,[9] the actual slayer, at least he is not guilty of a higher degree or grade of homicide than the actual slayer[10] At common law an accessary could not be guilty of any other or higher grade of homicide than that of which the principal was guilty,[11] but it is now generally held that an accessary, or principal in the second degree, or aider and abettor is not necessarily guilty of the same grade or degree of homicide as the actual perpetrator[12] Thus, although the direct actor in the commission of the homicide is guilty of murder, as defined by common law, one who participates may be guilty of manslaughter only, as, for example, where he acted in the heat of passion, without malice, and without knowledge of the malice of the direct actor[13] On the other hand, the direct actor may be guilty of manslaughter only, and the other of murder, as, for example, where the latter participated maliciously while the former was acting in sudden heat of passion due to adequate provocation, and without malice.[14]

Accessaries before the fact to manslaughter There is authority both for[15] and against[16] the view that there can be an accessary before the fact to manslaughter. Some authorities consider the kind of manslaughter and hold that there cannot be accessaries before the fact to voluntary manslaughter,[17] but that such accessaries may exist in cases of involuntary manslaughter[18] Clearly there cannot be accessaries before the fact in manslaughter or in negligent homicide where the statutes of the jurisdiction so provide[19]

Principals in the second degree to manslaughter One may be held guilty as a principal in the second degree, or as an aider and abettor, to the crime of manslaughter,[20] including, according to the weight of authority, involuntary manslaughter,[21] although as to the latter proposition there is some authority to the contrary[22]

Accessaries before the fact to murder in the second and third degrees Where malice is an element of the crime of murder in the second degree, there may be accessaries before the fact in the commission of the offense[23] Murder in the third degree also admits of accessaries before the fact where malice is an element of that offense.[24]

Necessity of conviction or identification of perpetrator At common law a conviction of the principal was required to precede or accompany that of one charged as an accessary to a homicide,[25] but this is no longer necessary under the statutes in some jurisdictions[26] If two or more are acting independently, and the actual perpetrator of the homicide cannot be identified, all must be acquitted, although it is certain that one of them was guilty;[27] but, as shown infra subdivision c of this section, identification of the actual perpetrator is not required where the parties have acted pursuant to a common design

Participation may consist not only in physically aiding the commission of the homicide, but also in oral expressions or encouragement, but mere knowledge, or presence at the scene, of the homicide is insufficient. The aid may be furnished in the preliminary stages of the homicide or at the time of its commission, but not thereafter

In order that a person other than the actual slayer become a participant in, and responsible for, a homicide he must in some manner, by overt act or oral announcement, encourage, assist, or instigate the actual perpetrator[28] Mere mental assent to, or tacit approval of, the homicide, or sympathy with the perpetrator, does not constitute participation,[29] nor does one become an accessary before the fact because he knew that a homicide was to be committed by another and concealed the fact or failed to prevent its commission.[30] One who participates in a homicide is criminally responsible and may be held liable notwithstanding his participation is without preconcert, prearrangement, or conspiracy with the actual perpetrator.[31] It is not necessary that the participant should have originated the criminal design,[32] or that the actual perpetrator should have known that the other was rendering him assistance.[33]

Responsibility attaches to one who aids or assists in the actual commission of the homicide,[34] as for example, by holding the victim or otherwise preventing him from defending himself,[35] joining in shooting at the victim,[36] preventing the escape of the victim,[37] or encouraging the actual perpetrator in the commission of the act.[38] The assistance or encouragement of an aider or abettor may consist of overt acts or oral expressions,[39] and responsibility attaches to one who advises or counsels,[40] incites or instigates,[41] or employs, hires, or procures[42] the slayer to commit the homicide.

Aid in preliminary stages of homicide One may become criminally responsible for a homicide by rendering help to the perpetrator in the preliminary stages of the homicide,[43] as by provoking a difficulty with the victim for the purpose of furnishing a pretext for killing him,[44] inducing the victim to go where the murderer lies in wait,[45] detaining the victim until the murderer arrives,[46] pointing out the intended victim to the actual perpetrator,[47] taking the victim into custody at the orders of the murderer,[48] harboring the murderers in one's home for the purpose of accomplishing the killing,[49] or engaging a guide to conduct the murderers to the house of the victim.[50] One becomes a participant in the homicide by furnishing the actual perpetrator with a weapon with which to do the killing and for that purpose,[51] but the fact that accused furnished the weapon with which the homicide was committed does not of itself make him a participant where there was no prearranged plan between accused and the perpetrator, and accused did not in any way encourage, abet, or assist the perpetrator.[52]

Presence as constituting participation The mere presence of a person at the time and place of a homicide without his giving of aid or encouragement at or before its commission to the parties thereto and without preconcert does not amount to aiding and abetting or other participation in the crime,[53] notwithstanding he knows that the crime is to be committed.[54] One who is present at a homicide does not become a participant therein by the fact that he passively acquiesces in, or negatively consents to, the commission of the homicide,[55] or makes no effort to prevent its commission,[56] apprehend the perpetrator,[57] or report the homicide,[58] even approval of the homicide, not communicated to the actual perpetrator, does not of itself constitute participation on the part of one present thereat.[59] On the other hand, one becomes a participant in a homicide where he is present at the time and place of the crime by preconcert with the actual perpetrator,[60] or where he intends to assist, if necessary, in the commission of the homicide, and the fact of such presence and intention is communicated to the actual perpetrator,[61] and there is au-

Evidence that accused told enraged woman who had been drinking that if she wanted to "raise hell," she could use his gun and to go ahead and "kill all of them," handing her his loaded pistol and that woman almost immediately killed another woman showed that accused was principal in second degree, and sustained conviction of voluntary manslaughter, notwithstanding accused specified no victim and attempted to retrieve pistol immediately after parting with it.—McCoy v. thority, also, to the effect that, where a bystander is a friend of the actual perpetrator and knows that his presence will encourage him, he participates by being present [62]

Time of participation To render one responsible as a participant in a homicide his participation must occur either at the time of the homicide or prior thereto, he cannot become an aider and abettor by injecting himself into the situation after the crime has been committed,[63] although he may by rendering aid after the commission of the homicide become an accessary after the fact, as considered infra § 10 One does not become an accessary before the fact or a principal by approving the homicide after its perpetration,[64] nor does he become an accomplice by the mere fact that he knows an unlawful homicide has been committed, and fails to report it [65]

Operative effect of assistance In order to render one a principal in the second degree or an accessary before the fact in the commission of a homicide, his acts must in some manner have contributed to the killing [66] It is not necessary, however, that they contribute in the sense that but for such acts, the killing would not have occurred, it is sufficient if they facilitate the killing, although it might have taken place without their occurrence [67] In accordance with this rule, one is responsible if his acts deprive deceased of a chance of life which he might otherwise have had, although it does not appear that he would have availed himself of that chance [68]

One is not responsible for a homicide committed by another unless he shared the criminal intent of the actual slayer, and this is so notwithstanding he had some previous difficulty with the victim The intent may, however, be formed at the scene of the homicide.

In order to render one responsible as an aider, abettor, principal in the second degree, or accessary before the fact in the commission of a homicide it is essential that he share in the criminal intent of the direct actor [69] Thus, although one may have had some difficulty or altercation with deceased, he is not responsible for a homicide committed at or about the same time, by a third person, acting independently and without a prior understanding, if he did not share in the design of such third person,[70] and in this connection it is immaterial that the altercation brought on the fatal encounter,[71] or that accused was the aggressor in the difficulty,[72] or that the third person interfered to aid him [73] It is not enough that the acts of one tended to aid or encourage the principal in the first degree, they must have been done for that purpose[74] The fact that one has "caused" the killing of another does not establish that he aided and abetted a criminal homicide, since one may cause the death of another without intending so to do, that is, one may have caused the death of another and yet have been without the necessary criminal intent to make him responsible[75]

(2) Accused was not an aider or abettor of homicide where he had engaged in fist fight with several other persons and his companion, previously unarmed picked up a pistol dropped by an adversary and immediately fired the fatal shot, there being no showing of concerted action, or that accused gave any encouragement to his companion in the commission of the homicide Combs v Commonwealth 6 S W 2d 1082, 224 Ky 653

The intent to aid and abet in the commission of a homicide may be formed at the scene of the crime, even though accused may have gone there without any such intention,[76] and, although the original assembling of the parties charged was lawful,[77] or was had without any particular object in view,[78] their subsequent conduct may be of such a character as to show guilty participation in the homicide afterward committed One who participates in the commission of a homicide with full knowledge of the criminal intent with which the actual perpetrator is acting thereby adopts the intent of the direct actor as his own,[79] but he adopts it only to the extent of his knowledge, or of the natural and reasonable consequences of the act participated in by him[80]

Homicide by opponents of accused While there is authority to the contrary,[81] it is generally held, in accordance with the rule requiring a participant to share in the intent of the actual slayer, that those who participate on one side of a contest are not responsible for a homicide committed by their opponents[82]

Premeditation, malice In a jurisdiction in which all distinctions between principals in the first or second degree or between principals and accessaries before the fact have been abolished, if the actual slayer had the malice aforethought and premeditation required for murder in the first degree, one who has advised or commanded the killing is also chargeable with such malice and premeditation.[83] In a jurisdiction where a distinction is observed between a principal in the first degree and a principal in the second degree, it has been held that, where premeditation is material, it should be established as well against a principal in the second degree as against a principal in the first degree,[84] and that, where murder is sought to be predicated, not on the ground that it was perpetrated during the commission of some other unlawful act or felony, but on the ground that it was committed out of a premeditated design to effect death, in order to convict a principal in the second degree it is necessary to show either that he acted on a premeditated design to take human life, or else that he knew that the actual perpetrator intended to kill[85] Where the homicide is not such as to require a premeditated design to kill on the part of the actual perpetrator, it is unnecessary to establish such a design on the part of one who was present, actually or constructively, aiding and abetting in the unlawful act[86]

e. Common Design

(1) In general
(2) Common design to kill
(3) Natural consequences, departure from design

(1) In General

One who joins in a common design to commit an unlawful act involving danger to life is responsible for a homicide committed in furtherance of the design, although he was not the actual slayer and the plan did not expressly involve the taking of life This rule has been applied where the common design was to commit assault, burglary, robbery, and other crimes

All who join in a common design to commit an unlawful act, the natural and probable consequence of which involves the contingency of taking human life, are responsible for a homicide committed by

Husband and wife

Where without coercion on husband's part, wife engaged with her husband in the commission of a felony, and murder was committed by the husband in connection with the other crime, the wife is also guilty. Miller v. State, 25 Wis. 384.

Guilt as "principal"

(1) Those who aid and abet actual slayer pursuant to common purpose or design are guilty of the homicide as "principals."—Suhay v. U.S. C.C.A. Kan., 95 F.2d 890, certiorari denied 58 S.Ct. 1060, 304 U.S. 580, 82 L.Ed. 1543.

(2) Under federal statutes, a person who, in the commission of an illegal act with others, arms and instructs his confederates to kill if obstructed in the attempt, with the purpose and intent that they do so, is in law a "principal" in any willful killing resulting from carrying out those instructions.—Young v. U.S. C.C.A. Tex., 97 F.2d 200, 117 A.L.R. 816, rehearing denied 97 F.2d 1023.

(3) One who remained in an automobile, with the engine running and horn blowing to drown the sound of pistol shots, and who was in a position to come to the assistance of the actual slayer to prevent him from being surprised or to give alarm to favor his escape was present and aiding and abetting in the commission of the homicide and was as much a principal, in legal contemplation, as the actual slayer.—State v. Daleo, 154 So. 437, 179 La. 516—State v. Capaci, 154 So. 419, 179 La. 462.

Necessity of conspiracy to commit felony

(1) If the homicide was committed in the course of a conspiracy to commit a felony, all of the parties to the conspiracy are guilty of murder but if the conspiracy was to commit a less serious offense not naturally tending to the destruction of human life the conspirators are guilty of manslaughter only.—Rush v. Town of Farmerville, 101 So. 243, 156 La. 857.

(2) To render the conspirators liable for murder the conspiracy must have been to commit a felony, and in this connection it has been held that conspiracy itself is a misdemeanor only, and not a felony, but if the conspiracy was to commit a felony, and the homicide was committed in the course of the felony or an attempt to commit the felony, all the conspirators were guilty of murder.—People v. Collins, 137 N.E. 753, 234 N.Y. 355.

Operative effect of accused's acts

It is not necessary that the acts of accused must have resulted in encouraging, instigating, inciting, advising, or counseling others in the common design to kill.—Durden v. State, 93 So. 342, 18 Ala. App. 498, certiorari denied Ex parte Durden, 93 So. 922, 208 Ala. 697.

Statute held not to affect rule

A statute making any "person" who has killed another in attempting to commit an unlawful act guilty of murder does not change the rule stated in the text, since the statute is applicable to an act committed by two or more persons, notwithstanding its use of "person" in the singular. thorities, his intent is imputable to the others.[91] Responsibility attaches although the taking of life was not specifically intended or contemplated by the parties or involved in the plan,[92] or was even forbidden by accused,[93] and the fact that accused regretted that the killing had occurred in no way lessens his responsibility.[94]

A common design need not have existed for any particular length of time before the commission of the homicide,[95] it is sufficient if there was a community of purpose between accused and the direct actor at the time the homicide was committed.[96] Liability on the part of the confederates is not excused by the fact that the person killed was one of the confederates,[97] except, it has been held, where the death of a conspirator occurs by his own act.[98] The liability of one who has aided and abetted a homicide does not depend on whether any of his co-conspirators, or persons acting for them, have been indicted.[99]

Particular unlawful acts The rule holding one responsible for a homicide committed by his confederate in the furtherance of a common design has been applied where the common object or purpose was to commit or perpetrate an assault[1] involving

Remaining nearby to aid escape

One who was stationed near the courts on the question, to resist arrest[9] with dangerous weapons,[10] or to engage in the unlawful manufacture or transportation of intoxicating liquors.[11]

It has been held that there can be no common design to commit a negligent act resulting in homicide.[12]

Lawful common design Where the common purpose of several persons sought to be charged with criminal responsibility for a homicide committed by another is shown to have been lawful and to have been planned to be accomplished by lawful means, they will not be held criminally responsible for a homicide which has been committed by one of their number by reason of his own malice or independent intent, and which was not incidental to the common purpose, unless with knowledge of his criminal intent they actually participated in his crime by rendering him aid or encouragement in its perpetration.[13]

Presence Where several persons join in a common, unlawful design, and each takes the part assigned to him, some to commit the act, others to watch to prevent a surprise or to aid an escape, they are all present at a homicide committed in the course of carrying out the common design.[14] A conspirator need not, however, have been within sight or hearing of the homicide,[15] he is liable for a homicide committed by his co-conspirator in furtherance of the common design whether he was present at the homicide or not.[16]

(2) Common Design to Kill

One who joins in a common design to kill is responsible for a homicide committed by any of the participants, although he was not the direct perpetrator and had not contemplated the precise outcome which ultimately resulted

All who join in a common design to kill, whether in a sudden emergency, or pursuant to a conspiracy, are liable for the acts of each of their accomplices in furtherance thereof.[17] Responsibility attaches to one who participates in such a venture notwithstanding another was the principal actor in the commission of the homicide,[18] or the conspirator who actually committed the homicide cannot be identified,[19] for it is immaterial which one fired the fatal shot or delivered the fatal blow.[20] This liability attaches, although the culpable acts were not specifically contemplated, as where the common design was to kill one person but by mistake or misfortune another was killed,[21] and although accused did not know when or how the homicide was to be committed, or what particular individual was to do the killing,[22] or was under the impression that the person whose death he was endeavoring to bring about was a different individual from the one actually killed.[23] The law fixes no time for the commencement or duration of a conspiracy to murder so as to render each of the conspirators criminally responsible.[24]

(3) Natural Consequences, Departure from Design

One who joins in a common design is not responsible for a homicide committed by one of the participants out of private malice or for some purpose unconnected with the original design, nor is he responsible for a homicide committed after completion of, or his withdrawal from, the original design. Responsibility is not avoided under this rule, however, merely by the fact that the homicide was committed during an attempted escape, or after withdrawal from the scene of the unlawful act

Criminal responsibility for a homicide committed by a fellow conspirator does not extend to every killing more or less connected with the conspiracy to commit an unlawful act.[25] Responsibility attaches only where the homicide was committed in furtherance of the common design[26] or was a natural consequence, departure from, of the original design.

The fact that killing was result, direct or remote, of conspiracy to rob is not sufficient of itself to establish responsibility on the part of those who did not actually perpetrate the killing. It must be shown that the killing occurred in the attempted execution of the design to commit a robbery.—People v. Ryan, 189 N.E. 225, 263 N.Y. 298.

Failure to connect homicide with conspiracy

Where accused and others intended to commit a robbery in a building, and accused remained outside as driver of automobile, proof which shows only the killing of a police officer in the building but which does not show any connection of the killing with the proposed robbery will not warrant conviction of accused for homicide.—People v. Basile, 190 N.E. 307, 356 Ill. 171.

ural and probable result thereof[27] A conspirator is not responsible for a killing committed by his co-conspirator as an independent act, growing out of some private malice or purpose of the slayer, and not in furtherance of, or connected with, the original unlawful purpose,[28] particularly where the common design did not contemplate the commission of a homicide, and was of such a nature that a homicide would not be a natural or probable result[29] A distinction has been made that, if the common design was to commit a trespass or a minor offense, the accomplices are not liable for a homicide committed by the principal unless it was a plain and direct consequence of the design,[30] whereas, if the common design was to commit a felony, they are liable, although the homicide resulted collaterally therefrom[31]

One who joins in a common design to kill is not responsible for a homicide committed by another, not in pursuance of, or connected with, the common design[32] Thus, if two persons conspire to commit murder and one of them conspires with another to commit a different murder, the one who is involved in only the first conspiracy will not be responsible for the acts of the others in consummating the second[33]

Withdrawal from, or completion of, common design, homicide during escape One who has joined in a common design to kill, or to commit an unlawful act, the natural and probable consequence of the execution of which involves the contingency of taking human life, escapes responsibility for a homicide committed by a confederate in pursuance of the common design, if, before the homicide was committed, he withdrew entirely from the undertaking,[34] and the fact of his withdrawal was communicated to his associates, under such circumstances as would permit them to take the same action[35] Notwithstanding his attempted withdrawal, he is responsible for a homicide committed in pursuance of the original design, or as a natural or probable consequence of the execution thereof, by one of his associates to whom, prior to the commission of the crime, the fact of his withdrawal had not been communicated,[36] or, if it had, was not communicated under such circumstances as would permit his associate to withdraw[37] There is authority to the effect that the acts of one who has in fact withdrawn from participation in the common design, performed with the intention of communicating the fact of his withdrawal to an associate, need not necessarily produce the effect intended, it being sufficient if what was done should have been effectual for the purpose.[38] A participant in a common design is not responsible for a homicide committed by one of the others after the enterprise has been abandoned after a failure.[39]

Those who have joined in a common design to commit an unlawful act are not responsible for a homicide committed by one of their associates after the common object has been accomplished,[40] to render the conspirators liable for murder committed in the furtherance of a common design to commit a felony, the felony must have been in the course of commission when the killing occurred.[41] In this connection the common purpose is not complete so as to exempt one for a homicide committed by another of the participants in the common undertaking where further joint action in making an escape is contemplated,[42] and thus accused ordinarily is not relieved from responsibility by the fact that the homicide was committed at a time when one or more of the conspirators were attempting to escape from the scene of the offense which was the subject of the conspiracy,[43] at least if the conspirators contemplated and intended the doing of everything necessary to effect an escape,[44] including the killing of any one obstructing their escape.[45] In the absence of a common purpose to resist with great violence, or to kill any person who interfered with or attempted to apprehend the participants, it has been held that one is not liable for a homicide committed by one of the others during an escape where he did not consent thereto.[46]

Withdrawal from the scene of the homicide does not of itself establish the fact of withdrawal from the common design and absence of responsibility for a homicide committed by a confederate,[47] nor does it establish communication of the fact of withdrawal to those with whom he was acting,[48] but withdrawal from the scene, with the intention that such action should advise those associated with one that he had withdrawn from participation in the common design, may be considered with the other circumstances in determining whether the fact of his abandonment of the common purpose was communicated to his associates.[49]

§ 10. —— Accessaries after the Fact

An accessary after the fact to homicide is one who knows that the homicide has been committed and aids the perpetrator as by harboring him, or secreting the body Mere failure to report the homicide does not constitute one an accessary after the fact

An accessary after the fact is one who, knowing a homicide to have been committed, aids or assists a party thereto to escape apprehension or punishment[50] Ordinarily to render one liable as accessary after the fact, he must have had actual knowledge, at the time the aid or assistance was rendered, that the one so aided or assisted was a party to a homicide,[51] but it has been held that, if one had actual knowledge of facts which would give him good reason to believe the person assisted to be a party to a homicide, it is sufficient to render him responsible as an accessary after the fact[52] Proof that a person was an accessary after the fact is proof of a different offense than the homicide, and such proof does not make the accessary a principal as to the homicide[53]

A person who assists in secreting the body after a homicide is liable as an accessary after the fact,[54] and, where that is his sole connection with the homicide, only as an accessary after the fact[55] One who harbors and protects the slayer is an accessary after the fact notwithstanding, at the time he does so, no formal charge has been made against the slayer,[56] although, as shown in Criminal Law § 98, there is some authority holding that the existence of such a charge is necessary with respect to crimes generally, where the governing statute requires that the person assisted be "charged" with a felony There may be accessaries after the fact both to voluntary and to involuntary manslaughter[57]

One does not become an accessary after the fact by knowing of the commission of the homicide and failing to report it,[58] or even by falsely denying knowledge of the killing when questioned by public officers[59] A statute prohibiting any one from receiving, harboring, or concealing the guilty person has been held not violated by a concealment of the crime and the body of the murdered person[60] Aid or assistance rendered to a party to a homicide does not constitute one an accessary after the fact when the aid or assistance was rendered before the death of the victim[61] Under some statutory provisions certain persons cannot be accessaries after the fact[62] Where two unite in the commission of a murder and a third person agrees to conceal the fact that one of the principals participated in the crime and to throw the entire guilt on the other, such third person is not an accessary after the fact as to the person whose guilt is not concealed[63]

§ 11. Cause of Death

a In general
b Proximate cause; natural result of act
c Improper treatment of injury

a. In General

In determining whether the act of accused has caused death, the test is whether such act has contributed to the death, and, if it has, responsibility is not avoided by the fact that independent causes, such as the negligence of deceased or others, have also contributed It is immaterial by what instrumentalities accused has caused death, accused is responsible for causing the victim to encompass his own death

63. Tex —Schackev v State, 53 S W 877, 41 Tex Cr 255

One is not legally responsible for a homicide unless his unlawful act, or unlawful omission to discharge a duty which he owed to deceased, contributed to the death of the victim.[64] Thus one who injured or wounded deceased[65] in a manner not calculated or likely to endanger life,[66] or even mortally,[67] is not guilty of homicide where death has resulted solely from an independent cause. However, the unlawful act or omission of accused need not be the sole cause of the death,[68] the test of responsibility is whether the act of accused contributed to the death,[69] and, if it did, he is not relieved of responsibility by the fact that other causes also contributed.[70] So, if an injury or act committed by accused contributed to the death, he is responsible, although the negligence of third persons also contributed thereto,[71] or although other injuries or wounds, whether or not mortal, inflicted independently by another, also contributed thereto,[72] and were subsequent in point of time.[73]

Ordinarily a person may be held responsible for a homicide and guilty of murder or manslaughter, according to the circumstances, in whatever manner or by whatever means the death was caused, provided it was caused by his unlawful act or omission.[74] One may be responsible also for a death caused by an omission to act, where he was under a legal duty to act, as well as for death caused by his positive act.[75] At early common law the view obtained that responsibility for homicide did not attach where there was no physical or corporeal injury, as for example, where death was the result solely of grief or fear,[76] but the modern rule is that, if the act of accused was the direct and actual cause of the death, a conviction may be sustained for a death caused by fright, fear, or terror alone,[77] even though no hostile demonstration or overt act was directed at the person of deceased.[78] Clearly one is responsible if death resulted from the combined effect of physical injury and fright occasioned by his unlawful act.[79]

Contributory negligence of deceased If a negligent or culpable act of accused was a cause of death, it is not a defense to a prosecution for homicide that the negligence of deceased contributed thereto,[80] notwithstanding the contributory negligence was such as would defeat a civil action for damages.[81] However, decedent's conduct may show that accused's act was not the cause[82] or was not, under the circumstances, negligence.[83]

Death from act of deceased caused by accused's conduct Accused is responsible if the direct cause was an act of deceased himself reasonably due to accused's unlawful conduct.[84] In accordance with this rule a person who by actual assault or threat of violence causes another, acting on well grounded or reasonable fear or apprehension, to do an act resulting in physical or corporeal injury causing his death is responsible for homicide.[85] In order to fasten responsibility on him, however, it is essential that the fear or apprehension under which the deceased acted should have been well grounded or reasonable.[86]

b. Proximate Cause; Natural Result of Act

The act of accused must be a proximate cause of death but need not be the direct, immediate cause. It is sufficient if the direct cause resulted naturally from the act of accused, as where the direct cause was a disease or infection resulting from the injury inflicted by accused

To warrant a conviction for homicide it is necessary,[87] but sufficient,[88] to establish that the act of accused was a proximate cause of death In this connection proximate cause does not necessarily mean the last act of cause or the act nearest in point of time to the death, it means rather nearness in point of causal relation [89] Accused's act or omission need not be the immediate cause of the death and he is responsible if the direct cause resulted naturally from his conduct [90] An injury is the efficient, proximate cause of the death where it directly and materially contributed to the happening of a subsequent accruing immediate cause of the death,[91] or, as the rule is sometimes stated, if the act of accused was the cause of the cause of death, no more is required [92]

It is not sufficient that the act of accused was the cause of a condition or situation affording an opportunity for the compassing of the death by some other unconnected agency,[93] so that, if the injury inflicted by accused was not mortal, and deceased, while suffering from its effects, became ill with a disease not caused by the injury, from which disease death resulted, he who inflicted the injury is not responsible for the death,[94] although the fatal progress of the disease was accelerated by the enfeebled or irritated condition of deceased caused by the injury [95]

Death from condition caused by injury Accused cannot escape responsibility where his act produced a condition causing death, although the condition might have been the immediate cause of death [96] If a wound or other injury causes a disease or infection, such as gangrene, empyema, erysipelas pneumonia, or the like, from which deceased dies, he who inflicted the wound or other injury is responsible for the death,[97] particularly if there is no evidence of gross neglect or improper treatment [98]

c. Improper Treatment of Injury

It is not a defense to one whose act has contributed to the death that improper treatment on the part of physicians, nurses, or the victim also contributed thereto, but one who has inflicted an injury is not responsible for homicide where death results solely from erroneous treatment by another.

One who has inflicted an injury which is dangerous, that is, calculated to destroy or endanger life, is not relieved of responsibility by the fact that the immediate or a contributing cause of the death was erroneous or unskillful medical treatment or care of the injury [99] by deceased,[1] or by a physician,[2] or by nurses or other attendants [3] Thus it is not a defense that the victim died during or as the immediate result of a surgical operation rendered necessary by the existence of the wound,[4] or that there was a possible mode of treatment which might have averted death,[5] or that deceased might have recovered if he had submitted to an operation,[6] or had adopted a different diet [7] One who inflicts an injury is not responsible, however, where death results solely from erroneous or unskillful treatment of the injury [8] In a jurisdiction where the statutes in effect so provide, one who has inflicted an injury which would not otherwise have been fatal is not responsible for a death occurring as a result of gross negligence or manifestly improper treatment [9]

d. Prior Causes

Responsibility for homicide attaches to one who accelerates the death of a person in poor physical condition, although the injury inflicted would not have killed a healthy person, and although the condition from which the victim was suffering would itself probably have been fatal Accused's ignorance of the victim's poor condition is immaterial

Responsibility attaches where the injury material-

Victim's misconduct or maltreatment of wound

One who has inflicted a wound which is not calculated or likely to endanger life is not responsible for homicide where death resulted solely as a result of the victim's misconduct or maltreatment of the wound —State v Johnson, 175 A 669, 6 W W Harr, Del, 341

ly accelerates the death, although the death is proximately occasioned by a preexisting cause[10] Thus if deceased was diseased or in feeble health and died from the combined effects of the injury and of his physical condition, or if the injury accelerated the death from his physical condition, he who inflicted the injury is liable,[11] although the injury alone would not have been fatal had deceased been well[12] Similarly, accused is liable if deceased was suffering from a prior injury and the act of accused contributed to or accelerated his death, as where accused inflicted additional wounds which hastened the death of one already mortally wounded[13] Responsibility attaches for an injury which accelerated death although the condition from which the victim was suffering would itself probably have caused death,[14] or might have done so[15] The vitality which the victim possessed at the moment of accused's act, and the fact that he would have lived for only a short time in any event, are immaterial considerations, if any life at all was left the extinguishment of it is homicide[16] It is immaterial that accused did not know that deceased was in the feeble condition which facilitated the killing,[17] or that he did not reasonably anticipate that his act would cause death[18] If the death was solely due to disease, and was not caused or hastened by the injury, accused is not liable[19]

§ 12. Time of Death

Unless the statutes otherwise provide, the common-law rule prevails that death must occur within a year and a day from the injury For certain purposes the death relates back to the time of the injury.

At common law, and in the absence of statutes otherwise providing if more than a year and a day intervene between the injury and the death of the victim, the injury is not legally deemed the cause of the death, and the person who inflicted it is not criminally responsible for the homicide[20] The common-law rule is not abrogated by a statute providing for a short form of indictment in which an allegation that death occurred within a year and a day is unnecessary[21] In at least one jurisdiction the common-law rule has been abrogated by statute and it is no longer necessary that death result within a year and a day from the time of the injury[22]

When the death does occur within a year and a day, it relates back, for certain purposes, to the time at which the injury was inflicted[23] Accused must, for example, be tried according to the laws in force at that time[24]

Unlawfully

"It is not every homicide committed deliberately, premeditatedly, and with malice that is murder The homicide must in addition, have been done unlawfully"—Slayton v State, specifically defining the offense, in which case the common-law definition is to be resorted to [26] Other statutes adopt the common-law definition and merely provide a more severe penalty where certain features are present,[27] or declare certain specifically described classes of homicide to be murder,[28] usually in connection with the division of the offense into degrees, see infra §§ 29–36 Statutes embracing the common-law definition of murder should be interpreted as is the common-law [29]

The crime of murder is a composite one It includes the assault committed on a person with intent to kill, and the resulting death from that assault Neither the assault nor the death of the person alone constitutes the crime [30]

The unlawful killing may be by any of the various means by which death may be occasioned [31]

Brutality The brutality or atrociousness of the homicide is not an element of the crime of murder [32]

Constructive murder The term "constructive murder" has been applied to those cases where, although the want of any actual intent to take life is conceded, yet the law, in view of some other malicious or criminal intent, punishes the offense as murder, and to cases of death produced through an utter wantonness and recklessness as to life in general, as well as to cases where the life of an officer is unintentionally taken when engaged in the performance of his duty [33]

Intent Murder involves intent,[34] that is, the act must have been with the required willful, felonious, and malicious intent on the part of accused,[35] and not under circumstances constituting justifiable or excusable homicide, see infra §§ 97–138 Although the general definition of malice in murder cases involves the deliberate intent unlawfully to take the life of a fellow creature, see infra § 14, a specific intent to kill, as discussed infra § 20, is not necessarily an essential element of the crime of murder

"Kill" distinguished The word "murder" implies something more than mere killing [36] It implies a felonious homicide, while the word "kill" does not contain such implication [37] The word "kill," when applied to persons, implies force, violence, a destruction of the organs necessary to life, and, if unaccompanied by any explanation or qualifying words, may have a felonious signification [38]

Motive As discussed infra § 318, proof of motive is not indispensable to a conviction of the crime of homicide

Petty treason distinguished At common law the crime of petty treason, discussed in the C J S title Treason § 1, also 63 C J p 814 note 4, was distinguished from murder only by the fact that it included the violation of that private allegiance which exists in the enumerated relations as to which the offense could be committed, and which was looked on as aggravating the degree of the offense, by making it treasonable in its nature Since murder was punished capitally, the distinction rested in the manner of punishment Such distinction is not recognized in the United States, and the sole effect of statutory abolition of the distinction is to abolish nothing, the distinction not existing [39]

§ 14. Malice in General

Malice is a necessary element of the crime of murder It signifies a condition of mind which shows a heart regardless of social duty and fatally bent on mischief.

In the absence of a statute providing otherwise,[40] malice is a necessary element of the crime of murder[41] Malice or malice aforethought is the element which distinguishes murder at common law and, commonly, under the statutes defining murder, from other grades of homicide[42] Conversely, it has been stated that any unlawful killing of a human being with malice aforethought is murder,[43] and the character of weapon employed is immaterial if the act producing death is willfully and maliciously committed.[44]

40. In Florida it has been held that the statutory definitions of murder do not make malice an element of the offense —Riggins v State, 83 So 267, 78 Fla 459

In Texas

(1) Under the statute providing that whoever shall voluntarily kill any person within this state shall be guilty of murder murder may be committed with or without malice —Davis v State, 10 S W 2d 116, 110 Tex Cr 605

Definition. It is difficult to explain clearly what the law means by malice[45] Generally speaking, it signifies a condition of the mind and heart at the time of the fatal act[46] Malice is the deliberate intent unlawfully to take away the life of a fellow creature,[47] but it does not of necessity import ill-will toward the individual injured[48] or toward any particular person[49] Malice signifies a general malignant recklessness of the lives and safety of others,[50] or a condition of the mind which shows a heart regardless of social duty and fatally bent on mischief,[51] in other words, a malicious killing is one where the act is done without legal justification, excuse, or extenuation,[52] and malice has been frequently substantially so defined as consisting of the intentional doing of a wrongful act toward another without legal justification or excuse[53] Malice includes not only anger, hatred, and revenge, but every other unlawful and unjustifiable motive[54] It is not necessary that the killing be in cold blood or with settled design and premeditation[55] On the other hand, a killing is obviously malicious where the perpetrator is actuated by ill-will toward the individual,[56] or by motives of hatred[57] or revenge[58]

Malice aforethought is an essential ingredient of murder No particular length of time is necessary for deliberation, and, if there is sufficient time for some reflection and consideration on the matter, it does not matter how brief it is.

Premeditation or malice aforethought is an essential ingredient of the offense of murder.[61] "Malice aforethought" or "malice prepense," which are the terms usually applied to the malice requisite in murder, is malice existing before the killing and acting as a cause of the killing [62] The term "malice aforethought" imports premeditation,[63] and has been held to involve deliberation,[64] although as to this there is contrary authority [65] It has been held that the deliberate design to kill must precede the killing by some appreciable space of time,[66] but no particular length of time is necessary for deliberation, and, if there is sufficient time for some reflection and consideration on the matter, it does not matter how brief it is [67] A deliberate intent to kill is not necessarily evidence of malice aforethought [68]

At common law no distinction is drawn between malice and malice aforethought,[69] and apparently there is no legal distinction between the terms and they may be used interchangeably,[70] and some statutory definitions of murder entirely omit the expression [71] Statutory expressions, such as "premeditated design"[72] or "deliberate design"[73] have been held to have the same meaning as "malice aforethought" as used at common law, but "malice aforethought" has been held not equivalent to "premeditated design to effect the death of the person killed, or of any other human being"[74]

Express or implied malice The expression "malice aforethought," as employed in common law and statutory definitions of murder, has been construed as embracing both express and implied malice,[75] although, as the expression was originally used, it conveyed only the idea of express malice [76] Some statutes defining murder describe the circumstances under which a killing shall constitute murder substantially in accord with the technical meanings given to express or implied malice [77]

§ 16. —— Express or Implied Malice

Malice is express when there is manifested a deliberate intention unlawfully to take away the life of a fellow creature. Implied malice is malice which inferentially appears from the circumstances attending the killing

At common law and under statutes declaratory thereof, the malice necessary to constitute the crime of murder may be either express or implied [78] The distinction between express and implied malice rests in the character of proof by which it is established and not in the particular condition of mind involved [79] Some statutory definitions of murder do not employ either of the terms [80]

Malice is express when there is manifested a deliberate intention unlawfully to take away the life of a fellow creature [81] Express malice is also said

"Express malice is the deliberate intention to take the life of another, which is manifested by circumstances capable of proof"—People v Motuzas, 185 N E 614, 617, 352 Ill 340—People v Scalisi, 154 N E 715, 324 Ill 131

"If it be shown that one kills another as a result of a deliberate intention to take life, the wickedness of spirit, or, in other words, the malice is called actual or express to exist where one with a sedate and deliberate mind and formed design kills another and the design is evinced by external circumstances discovering the inward intention,[82] the qualification that the killing must have been unlawful is sometimes added,[83] without which the definition is obviously incomplete and inaccurate.[84] Express malice has also been said to be evidenced where, on a sudden provocation, one inflicts on another a cruel and unusual punishment, so that he dies.[85] Malice is express when admitted or asserted,[86] or shown by positive and direct evidence.[87] However, it need not be evidenced by words only,[88] but it may be evidenced by external circumstances,[89] certain well recognized examples being frequently given,[90] such as lying in wait for the intended victim,[91] or the preparation and administration of poison for the purpose of taking life,[92] previous difficulties between accused and the victim,[93] or threats.[94] These examples are by no means exhaustive and any fact or circumstance which makes manifest the formed design of accused may be sufficient.[95] Personal ill will or hatred for the victim may show express malice,[96] but is not essential to its existence.[97] On the other hand, previous friendship with the victim may not be inconsistent with express malice at the time of the killing.[98] Where the facts and circumstances surrounding a homicide show a reckless disregard of human life, it is said to be conclusive evidence of express malice.[99]

Implied malice Malice may be inferred from the circumstances attending the killing,[1] and the courts have used the term "implied malice" as meaning malice not positively but inferentially appearing.[2] It has been said that malice is implied when there is no showing of actual intent to kill, but death is caused by acts which the law regards as manifesting such an abandoned state of mind as to be equivalent to a purpose to murder.[3] Implied malice also arises or may be inferred from the intentional do-malice"—State v. Phillips, 187 A. 108, 110, 7 W.W. Harr., Del., 541.

"Actual malice" of one charged with a homicide arises from a showing of malignancy, and is a mental attitude, the method of proving which cannot be definitely prescribed.—State v. Gunter, 17 S.E.2d 46, 123 W.Va. 569.

Express malice is usually shown by something accused did or said before the killing, or some other circumstance which indicates clearly that he had the intention to kill when he made the fatal attack.—State v. Galvano, 154 A. 461, 4 W.W. Harr., Del., 409.

3. Me.—State v. Merry, 8 A.2d 143, 136 Me. 243.

"Malice does not necessarily mean an actual intent to take human life. It may be intentional or implied, instead of positive, as when an act which imparts danger to another is done so recklessly or wantonly as to

ing of an unlawful or wrongful act with a wrongful purpose [1] Malice, it has been said, is implied by law from every deliberate and cruel act committed by one person against another no matter how sudden such act may be [5] By statute in some jurisdictions it is prescribed that malice shall be implied when no considerable provocation appears or when all circumstances of the killing show a wicked and malignant heart [6] A mere intent to injure, however, does not necessarily imply malice.[7]

§ 17. Intentional Killing

In the absence of circumstances serving to mitigate, excuse, or justify the act, an intentional and premeditated homicide unlawfully committed constitutes murder.

Since, if there are no circumstances serving to mitigate, excuse, or justify the act, malice is implied in every intentional and premeditated homicide unlawfully committed, as considered infra § 23, such killings constitute murder [8] Accordingly, one who in mutual combat by agreement with deadly weapons, as in a duel, kills his opponent,[9] or one who provokes combat as a pretext for killing his adversary,[10] or one who kills another at his request or command,[11] or one who kills in revenge for a past offense, no matter how outrageous and aggravating,[12] is guilty of murder

If a person voluntarily or willfully does an act which has a direct tendency to destroy another's life, the natural and necessary conclusion from the act is that he intended so to destroy such person's life [13]

§ 18. —— Intent to Kill One Person and Killing Another

The unlawful killing of one person, although the intent was to kill another, may constitute murder.

Since legal malice does not require ill will toward the victim, the crime may be murder although the person killed was not the one whom accused intended to kill,[14] as where the victim is mistaken manifest depravity of mind and disregard of human life"—State v Trott 130 S E 627, 629, 190 N C 671, 42 A L R 1114

Elements of offense

In prosecution for murder by accused, who killed one person while attempting to kill another, material elements of the offense which must be proved beyond reasonable doubt, are premeditated malice and purpose to kill the intended victim, and killing of actual victim in carrying out, or attempting to carry out, the offense against the intended victim —Noelke v State, 15 N E 2d 950, 214 Ind 427

for another,[15] or where one shooting at another kills a bystander or third person coming within range,[16] or where one partakes of poison which accused intended for another,[17] or receives a blow intended for another.[18] Actual malice toward the unintended victim is not necessary.[19] The grade of the crime in such cases will be the same as though accused had killed the person whom he had intended to kill.[20]

§ 19. —— Killing Officers and Others in Discharge of Public Duty

A person who intentionally kills an officer or other person engaged in the discharge of a public duty, such as the making of a lawful arrest, is guilty of murder.

One who, in resisting a lawful arrest, intentionally kills a person seeking to arrest him is guilty of murder.[21] This rule applies to the killing of a peace officer,[22] although only a de facto officer,[23] a member of his posse,[24] or a private citizen engaged in assisting him.[25] However, accused must have known or have been chargeable with knowledge of the authority or purpose with which the officer or individual was acting.[26] It is likewise murder intentionally to kill an officer in resisting his attempt to prevent an escape or rescue,[27] or in resisting an officer in the lawful discharge of any other duty imposed on him by law,[28] for example, in preserving the peace,[29] since the officer has a right to use all necessary force to discharge his duty properly, and, therefore, such forcible acts will not reduce the grade of the crime,[30] and it is immaterial which side began the attack.[31] Similar rules apply if a citizen is killed while engaged in preventing the commission of crime,[32] or in making an authorized arrest,[33] although the private individual is in the illegal possession of a warrant.[34] Even when an attempt to arrest is illegal, the killing of the officer with malice is murder.[35] It has been held, however, that malice could not be implied where accused in killing deceased, a peace officer, used no more force than necessary to extricate himself from an illegal arrest.[36]

(1) Under the federal statute, 18 U.S.C.A. § 253, the killing of certain federal officers while engaged in the performance of their official duties, or on account of the performance of their official duties, is homicide.—Arwood v. U. S., C.C.A.Tenn., 134 F.2d 1007, certiorari denied 63 S.Ct. 1436, 319 U.S. 776, 87 L.Ed. ——.—Barrett v. U. S., C.C.A.Ind., 82 F.2d 528.

(2) The words and intent of this statute are clear beyond the necessity of any canonical construction.—McNabb v. U. S., C.C.A.Tenn., 123 F.2d 818, certiorari granted 62 S.Ct. 1305, 316 U.S. 658, 86 L.Ed. 1736, reversed on other grounds 63 S.Ct. 608, 318 U.S. 332, 87 L.Ed. 579.

(3) To be amenable to punishment, the killer need not have known that he was killing an officer, agent or employee of the United States.—McNabb v. U. S., supra.

(4) An investigator of the alcohol tax unit was an "officer", "employee" and "agent" in the service of the internal revenue bureau, within meaning of this statute.—Arwood v. U. S., C.C.A.Tenn., 134 F.2d 1007, certiorari denied 63 S.Ct. 1446, 319 U.S. 776, 87 L.Ed. 1360.

Malice

Where an officer is killed in the discharge of his duty, it is not necessary to constitute the crime of murder that the slayer should have had any particular malice, provided the slaying was not done by accused in defending himself from an act of the officer in excess of his powers and authority as such.—Elliott v. Commonwealth, 161 S.W.2d 633, 290 Ky. 502.

Shooting without justification

Where those accused, when accosted by officers in the discharge of their duty for a violation of the law, began shooting without justification, the killing of an officer under such circumstances was murder, and not manslaughter.—People v. Watkins, 141 N.E. 204, 309 Ill. 318.

human life, causes the death of another, the perpetrator is guilty of murder, although he did not intend to kill[40] Likewise, if an assault was made upon deceased, not with the design of killing him, but of inflicting great bodily harm on him, it is murder if his death is caused thereby,[41] and it is murder where death results from an assault or other unlawful act, intentionally done in such a manner as was likely to cause death or serious bodily harm, even though there may have been no actual intent to cause death or great bodily harm,[42] but the injury intended must be such as involves serious consequence, either in endangering life or leading to great bodily harm,[43] and death or great bodily harm must have been a reasonable or probable consequence of the act[44] The omission or neglect to perform a duty resulting in death may constitute murder where the omission was willful and there was deliberate intent to cause death[45] So also, forcing one to do an act which will in all probability result in death is murder if death results.[46]

On the other hand, an intent to kill, either actual or implied, is essential to the commission of murder[47] Under a statute providing that whoever shall voluntarily kill any person within the state shall be guilty of murder, an intent to kill is a necessary ingredient of the crime of murder[48]

§ 21. —— Homicide in Commission of Other Crime

a In general
b Relationship between killing and crime; attempts

a. In General

An unintentional killing in the perpetration of or in an attempt to perpetrate, a felony constitutes murder.

An unintended homicide, committed by one who at the time is engaged in the commission of some other felony, is murder both at common law and under the statutes declaratory thereof,[49] even though the statute requires a premeditated design to effect death as a requisite of murder.[50] A homicide committed or caused by one engaged in committing a felony is murder, irrespective of whether the person killed was the one on whom, or on whose property, the attempt had been made, or was another who interfered to prevent its success.[51] It seems, however, that the felony committed or attempted must be dangerous to human life,[52] and the homicide must be an ordinary and probable effect of the felony.[53] On the other hand, a statute providing that whoever, purposely, or in perpetrating or attempting to perpetrate certain felonies, kills another is guilty of murder, has been held not to be declaratory of the common law, and it has been held that there must be a purpose and intent to kill before the crime of murder can be complete.[54]

Attempt

Under the common-law rule that an intentional homicide in the commission, or attempted commission of a felony was "murder," the essential ingredient is either the commission of the felony or the attempt to commit a felony and the criterion is not whether the mere attempt to commit the felony is of itself as a distinct crime a felony or a misdemeanor—Commonwealth v. Guida, 19 A 2d 98, 341 Pa 305

Prohibition law declaring sale of intoxicants a felony, did not render the sale of moonshine whisky in such an amount as to cause the death of the buyer to be murder, in absence of any intent to kill, since such sale was not an inherently dangerous common-law felony, but only "malum prohibitum," a crime existing only by statute—People v. The general rule under discussion applies, for example, to an unintended homicide committed by one who was at the time engaged in committing an unlawful abortion, where this has been made a felony by statute,[55] and under some statutes a homicide committed in procuring an abortion is expressly declared to be murder[56] It also applies to one who has unintentionally committed a homicide in committing arson,[57] burglary,[58] rape,[59] or robbery,[60] or who while attempting to commit suicide unintentionally kills another[61] It is also murder within this rule where accused administered drugs for the purpose of producing merely temporary unconsciousness in order to accomplish a felonious intent, but death resulted[62]

Misdemeanor If the natural consequences of an unlawful act to be dangerous to life, and so known to the wrongdoer,[63] or if the unlawful act involves a breach of the peace,[64] an unintentional killing, at common law and statutes declaratory thereof, will be murder, even though the unlawful act amounts to no more than a misdemeanor On the other hand, in the absence of such circumstances or of a statute to the contrary, an unintentional homicide committed in the perpetration of a misdemeanor does not constitute murder[65]

b. Relationship between Killing and Crime; Attempts

To constitute murder, an unintentional killing in the perpetration of a felony must have been the probable consequence of the unlawful act A homicide is committed in the perpetration of a felony when it is committed within the res gestae of the felony In order that homicide may be committed in an attempt to perpetrate a felony, it is essential that the acts shall have gone beyond the point of mere preparation to commit the felony

In order for a killing to have been done in the perpetration or attempted perpetration of a felony, or of a particular felony, there must be some connection between the felony and the homicide [66] The killing must have been done in pursuance of the unlawful act, and not collateral to it [67] It is not enough that the killing occurred soon, or presently, after the felony was attempted or committed, there must be such a legal relationship between the two that it can be said that the killing occurred by reason of and as a part of the felony, or that it occurred before the felony was at an end, so that the felony had a legal relationship to the killing and was concurrent with it in part, at least, and a part of it in an actual and material sense [68] A homicide is committed in the perpetration of a felony when it is committed by accused while he is engaged in the performance of any act required for the full execution of such felony [69] A murder may be committed in the perpetration of a felony, although it does not take place until after the felony itself has been technically completed, if the homicide is committed within the res gestæ of the felony [70] The crime or attempted crime is a fact, to

Robbery

(3) To end an attempted robbery, where the robbers remained in freedom and possessed of a deadly weapon at the place of the attempted robbery until a fatal shooting took place, there must have been at least an appreciable interval between the alleged termination and the fatal shooting, a detachment from the enterprise before the shooting had become so probable that it could not reasonably be stayed, and such notice or definite act of detachment that other principals in the attempted crime had opportunity also to abandon it be looked at objectively, and its beginning and end are marked by what is done, rather than by what is thought [71] Where the killing occurs after the felony has been completed and after the criminals have left the premises or are attempting to escape, the homicide, according to some authorities, is not committed in the perpetration of the felony,[72] but as to this there is authority to the contrary [73]

Under a statute making a killing murder when perpetrated by a person engaged in the commission of, or in an attempt to commit, or in "withdrawing from the scene of," a felony, there is no exact measure of the lapse of time or of the distance which accused must travel from the scene of the crime before it will be said that he is not withdrawing therefrom, and each case must depend on its own facts and circumstances [74] In a sense, a criminal has withdrawn from the scene of a felony if, after committing a crime, he keeps traveling in an attempt to escape, up to any conceivable distance, and in any direction, but such a "withdrawal" is not that contemplated by the statute [75] Under

Evidence that accused, after attempting to rape deceased, shot her in an attempt to escape detection and punishment, would not authorize conviction of murder in attempted perpetration of rape, since the murder was not part of the attempted rape and occurred after attempted rape was at an end —State v Opher, 188 A 257, 8 W W Harr, Del, 93

Person seeking capture

If, after attempted burglary or larceny, conspirators had been frightened away from the place of the crime, had quit their felonious acts or attempt and were seeking to escape by running away on the public streets, the death of a person seeking to capture them would not be the killing of a human being by a person engaged in the commission of a felony —People v Collins, 137 N E 753, 234 N Y 355

Securing plunder

The killing, to be a felony murder, must have occurred while the actor or one or more of his confederates was engaged in securing the plunder or in doing something immediately connected with the underlying crime Escape may, under certain unities of time manner and place, be a matter so immediately connected with the crime as to be part of its commission, but where there is reasonable doubt of a complete intervening desistance from the crime, as by the abandonment of the loot and running away, the subsequent homicide is not murder in the first degree without proof of deliberation and intent —People v Walsh, 186 N E 422, 262 N Y 140

Attempt to escape

Testimony showing that the homicide was committed while accused was attempting to escape from the scene of an admitted burglary justifies a verdict of murder in the first degree, although the original crime had been completed, for accused is responsible for the consequences following To alter this rule it must appear that the criminal act originally undertaken had been abandoned by accused's voluntary act —Commonwealth v Tauza, 150 A 649, 300 Pa 375

In different jurisdictions

Under such a statute the felony may be committed in one jurisdiction and the killing may take place in another, the only connection between them being the circumstance of accused's flight from the place of the one to the scene of the other —State v Barton, 105 P 2d 63, 5 Wash 2d 234

75. Wash —State v Diebold, 277 P. 394, 152 Wash 68.

such a statute, the felony is not necessarily directly included as an integral part of the murder, but is only incidentally related thereto [76]

Under a statute providing that a homicide committed by accused in freeing or attempting to free himself from arrest or confinement for a certain designated offense shall be punished, a murder committed in an attempt to escape confinement for such offense is within the statute notwithstanding the attempted escape is quite apart in respect of time and place from the commission of the offense [77]

Attempts In order that a homicide may be committed in an attempt to perpetrate a felony it is essential that the acts shall have gone beyond the point of mere preparation to commit the felony,[78] the attempt to perpetrate the felony must have been actual and not merely constructive,[79] and the killing must have occurred in the performance of such acts as would establish the independent substantive crime [80] Where, however, the design of accused to commit the crime is clearly shown, slight acts in furtherance of the design will constitute an attempt [81] If an attempt to commit a felony has been made, it is immaterial that the attempt was not carried beyond its initial stage[82] or is abandoned before its completion [83]

If accused would have killed a third person if he had not been frustrated by the presence and interference of deceased, if his act had gone to the extent of placing it in his power to commit the offense unless interrupted, and nothing but such interruption prevented the present commission of the offense, his conduct went sufficiently beyond mere preparation so as to constitute an attempt to commit the crime of murder -- People v Sobieskoda, 139 N E 558 235 N Y 411

On the other hand a mere intention to kill does not necessarily raise the inference of malice,[90] and, unless the killing is shown to have been intentional, unlawful, and deliberate,[91] the inference of malice arising from the fact of the homicide may be overcome by evidence of alleviation or justification[92] If in addition to the fact of killing, the attendant circumstances are shown in evidence, whether on the part of the prosecution or accused, the character of the killing is to be determined by considering them, and it is then not a matter for presumption which operates in the absence of explanatory evidence, but for determination from the circumstances shown in evidence,[93] and by statute, it is sometimes required that there shall be some other evidence of malice than the mere proof of killing in order to prove murder in certain specified

"Every person is presumed to intend the natural and probable consequences of his own act, and the use of a dangerous weapon resulting in a homicide, by one having no right to use the weapon and in the absence of mitigating facts when he did use it, is always regarded as evidence of the existence of malice aforethought"—Liggins v U S, 297 F 881, 885 51 App D C 302

Against vital part of body

The intentional unlawful, and fatal use of a deadly weapon against conclusive as to malice,[99] and the inference of malice therefrom may be overcome,[1] and it has been held that where the facts and circumstances of the killing are in evidence, the existence of malice must be determined as a fact from all the evidence.[2] It cannot be affirmed as a legal conclusion that an intent to take life is rebutted by the absence of a deadly weapon.[3]

Carrying or possession of deadly weapon Malice is not implied from the fact that one was carrying a dangerous weapon for self-defense,[4] or even from the fact that the weapon was carried in violation of law,[5] but if it appears that the weapon was provided for the purpose of killing another when occasion should arise, malice is implied.[6]

Character of weapon A deadly weapon is one which is likely to produce death or great bodily injury from the manner in which it is used,[7] and whether a weapon is to be regarded as deadly often depends more on the manner in which it has been used than on its intrinsic character.[8] The mere fact that an instrument produced death does not estab-

Acid

In determining the intent of accused in throwing acid on the face of his wife, the question is whether he knew or believed that, if thrown on the face, the result would be likely to be that of a deadly weapon used on a vital part of the body — Commonwealth v Kluska, 3 A 2d 398, 333 Pa. 65.

lish its character as a deadly weapon,[9] although it may be evidence thereof.[10] Among other instruments which may under the circumstances of their use be regarded as deadly weapons may be enumerated sticks and cudgels of various descriptions,[11] a black-jack,[12] metal bars and rods,[13] metallic knucks,[14] rocks,[15] bricks,[16] beer glasses,[17] knives,[18] scissors,[19] a hoe,[20] an ax,[21] a sledge hammer,[22] a chisel,[23] a steel screw driver,[24] a blacksmith's tongs,[25] a fence rail,[26] a hunting rifle,[27] a pistol or revolver used either for shooting[28] or striking,[29] and a shotgun used as a club.[30] A blow with the fist does not ordinarily imply malice,[31] although there may be an inference of malice where such an attack has been made on an infant of tender years or on a person enfeebled by old age or worn out by disease.[32]

Person of small stature

A malicious intent to kill cannot be presumed from the striking of a full-grown person on the head with the bare fists by a person of small stature and mediocre strength, although death results unless the assault was so vicious, continued deadly, and barbaric, and under such circumstances, that malice can be implied—State v Roush, 120 S E 304, 95 W Va 132

it must appear that its use was willful or intentional,[33] deliberate,[34] or wanton.[35] This, like other matters of intent, is to be gathered from the circumstances of the case, such as the fact that accused had the weapon prepared for use,[36] or that it was used in such a manner that the natural, ordinary, and probable result would be to take life.[37] On the other hand, the fact that accused, in the heat of combat, seized a stick or other object which casually happened to be near at hand, and struck the fatal blow with it, not having prepared any deadly instrument, is a circumstance which does not favor the implication of malice.[38]

Manner of use Malice is implied only when the homicide has been committed by the use of a dangerous weapon or instrument in such a manner as naturally and probably to cause death.[39]

Officer No presumption of malice arises by reason of the fact that accused, a peace officer, was armed with a deadly weapon,[40] and, if any malice is to be inferred, the inference must be drawn from the manner and circumstances in which he used his weapon.[41]

Superiority of weapon If one person kills another in mutual combat, the superiority of the weapon used by the slayer is not a fact from which malice is to be inferred.[42]

Under a statute providing that the intent to kill, justifying a finding of guilt of murder in the second degree, may be presumed whenever the means used is such as would ordinarily result in the death of the victim, the weapon or means used must either possess the quality of what is known as a deadly weapon without regard to the manner in which it was used or, if it is not such a weapon, the manner of its use must show that there was an evident intention to kill.[43]

§ 26. —— Administration of Poison

Malice is implied where death was occasioned by the intentional administration of poison

Malice is implied where death was occasioned by the intentional administration of poison.[44] If it appears that the poison was not administered with intent to take life, but to aid in the perpetration of another crime or in order to accomplish an unlawful act, it is no less murder.[45] If, however, it was not administered with intent to take life and where death as a result was so remote a contingency that no reasonable person could have taken it into consideration when administering the poison and could not have contemplated that death would result therefrom, malice will not be implied.[46]

§ 27. Presumption of Continuance of Malice

Where the existence of deliberate malice is once ascertained, its continuance down to the killing may be presumed, unless there is evidence to repel the presumption

Where the existence of deliberate malice in the slayer is once ascertained, its continuance down to the perpetration of the meditated act must be presumed, unless there is evidence to repel this presumption.[47] Where a deliberate purpose to kill or do great bodily harm is ascertained, and there was a consequent unlawful act of killing, the provocation, whatever it may be, which immediately preceded the act, is to be thrown out of the case and

Validity of statute
Statute providing that all murder which is perpetrated by means of poison is murder in the first degree is not invalid on the ground that accused is deprived of the right to have the jury determine the presence or absence of malice, intent to kill, deliberation, and premeditation —State v Flory, 210 N W 961, 203 Iowa 918

goes for nothing, unless it can be shown that this purpose was abandoned before the act was done,[48] and the presumption is that the crime found its moving impulse in malice, and not in the passion produced by the provocation,[49] but in order to bring a case within the principle that, where one having express malice toward another kills him, the killing is referable to the previous malice and not to a provocation at the time of the killing, it is not sufficient to establish a mere grudge or malice in its general sense, without showing a particular and definite intent to kill[50] However, there is authority for the view that the killing will not be presumed to have been on the antecedent malice,[51] and that this is for the jury to determine and it is error for the court to state such a presumption in its instructions[52] Where express malice and a subsequent reconciliation followed by fresh provocation have been proved, the law will refer the motive of the slayer to the recent provocation, and not to the antecedent malice, unless the special circumstances of the case forbid such a presumption[53] So, too, if a person, on unexpectedly meeting his adversary who intercepts him on his lawful road and in his lawful pursuit, accepts a fight which he might have avoided by passing on, the provocation being sudden and unexpected, the law will not presume it to be on the old grudge, but on the fresh insult given by stopping him on his way[54] In murder an intention may be and is often formed simultaneously with the act, and its existence cannot be adopted as a predicate from which an inference can be logically drawn that it existed prior to its manifestation[55]

§ 28. Burden of Overcoming Inference of Malice

The burden of overcoming any inference of malice arising in the case rests on accused

Where the killing is shown to have been of such character, or to have taken place under such circumstances, as to give rise to the presumption of malice, it devolves on accused to rebut this presumption,[56] but the burden is on him only in the sense that he must make proof of legal excuse, justification, or extenuation or else take the risk of a conviction on the presumption or inference of malice which has arisen[57] The evidence rebutting the presumption may be found in the evidence introduced by the prosecution[58]

B DEGREES

§ 29. In General

In some jurisdictions the crime of murder is divided into degrees for the purpose of adjusting the punishment in case of aggravating circumstances

At common law[59] and under some statutes[60] murder is not divided into degrees However, the statutes in many states divide murder into two or more degrees[61] As a rule these statutes do not change the quality of the crime of murder as it was defined at common law, but merely recognize that the crime may be more or less atrocious according to conditions and circumstances, and, therefore, provide greater punishment in some cases than in others,[62] and the degrees do not constitute distinct crimes but are grades of the same offense[63] Ordinarily, murder in any of the statutory degrees would be murder at common law,[64] and, conversely, to constitute murder in any degree malice is a requisite[65] Some statutes make an intent to kill an element of murder in all of its degrees, except, in some cases, of particular killings, as in commission of felonies,[66] or broaden the definition to include killings which would not be murder at common law[67]

Statutes defining the various degrees of murder have been held to be in pari materia and should be read together[68]

§ 30. First Degree

Murder in the first degree usually embraces all the elements of murder in lesser degrees and also consists of additional elements

The particular elements which shall constitute the crime of murder in the first degree is a matter of statutory regulation and will be discussed in detail in the sections immediately following Quite generally under the various statutes dividing murder into degrees, murder in the first degree embraces all the elements and essentials of murder in the second degree, and consists of additional elements[69] Variances between the degree of offense charged and the proof are discussed infra § 177, the sufficiency of proof of the degree of murder, infra § 328, instructions as to the grade or degree of the offense, infra §§ 389–398, and the rule that accused cannot complain that he was convicted of a lower degree of the crime than the evidence would have warranted is considered infra § 428

§ 31. —— Particular Statutory Provisions

Under the various statutes defining murder in the first degree, there are several general classes of homicides constituting such murder which are, in general, willful, deliberate, and premeditated killings, as killing by an act greatly dangerous to the lives of others, by poison or lying in wait, in the perpetration of felony or of enumerated felonies, and by torture

A provision common to many of the statutes which divide murder into degrees is the provision that any willful, deliberate, and premeditated killing shall constitute murder in the first degree[70] Substantially the same description of murder in the first degree is expressed by other statutes in different language[71] The fact that the statute provides that all murders which shall be perpetrated by means of poison or lying in wait or any other kind of willful, deliberate, and premeditated killing shall constitute murder in the first degree does not require the application of the doctrine of ejusdem generis so that it shall be construed as applicable only to acts of the same general nature or class as those enumerated[72]

Act greatly dangerous to lives of others. A killing perpetrated by an act greatly dangerous to the lives of others and evidencing a depraved mind regardless of human life, although without any preconceived purpose to deprive any particular person of life, is under some statutes murder in the first degree[73] This provision does not apply to cases of death produced by acts affecting a single individual,[74] or where there is an intent to kill any particular individual[75]

Poison or lying in wait. The statutes defining murder in the first degree frequently mention specifically murder perpetrated by means of poison[76] or by lying in wait[77] as being in that degree Lying in wait under such a statute consists in concealment for the purpose of taking the victim unawares, however it may be accomplished[78]

Perpetration of felony The statutes ordinarily classify as murder in the first degree killings committed in the perpetration of or attempt to perpetrate a felony,[79] or certain enumerated felonies,[80] such as arson,[81] burglary,[82] or certain enumer-

Adulteration of liquors

The language of statute making adulteration of liquors a crime and providing that, if death of person shall result from drinking adulterated liquor, "the crime shall be deemed murder and be punished accordingly" does not make the denounced act and culmination in death statutory "murder in first degree," but merely reaffirms the law as it was and would have been had such language not been used in the statute, and the denounced acts may culminate in murder in any one of the several degrees —Coston v State, 198 So 467, 144 Fla 676

ated felonies such as larceny,[83] rape,[84] robbery,[85] or certain described crimes, such as crimes punishable with death,[86] or by death or life imprisonment,[87] or by imprisonment in the penitentiary[88]

Under a statute making the unintentional killing of another while engaged in the commission of a felony murder in the first degree, the other elements constituting the felony must be so distinct from that of the homicide as not to be an ingredient of the homicide indictable therewith or convictable thereunder.[89] It is not necessary, however, that the act which caused the death must have been a different one from that done in the commission of the collateral felony, but if the act causing the death was committed with a collateral and independent felonious design, it is sufficient.[90]

If accused was actually engaged in the commission of a felony it is immaterial that his victim did not know he was so engaged.[91]

Torture, circumstances of atrocity or cruelty By some statutes murder when committed with extreme atrocity or cruelty is made murder in the first degree.[92] Other statutes provide that killing perpetrated by torture is murder in the first degree.[93] A murder committed with peculiar and extreme atrocity and cruelty does not amount to a murder perpetrated by means of torture.[94]

Felonious assault

"We think it self-evident that the trial judge committed error when he charged that the killing may have been effected while the defendant was engaged in a felonious assault upon him and, basing their conclusion thereupon, might determine that the defendant was guilty of murder in the first degree. If this were not error, then every intentional killing, by means of a dangerous weapon regardless of deliberation and premeditation would constitute the crime of murder in the first degree since every such killing must be preceded by the direction of such a weapon against the body of the person killed which in itself would constitute a felonious assault."—People v. § 32. —— Intent to Kill

a In general
b Particular classes of murders

a. In General

Under statutes requiring the killing to be "willful," "purposed," or with "premeditated design," a specific intent to take human life is necessary to constitute murder in the first degree, but a specific intention to take the life of the person killed is not generally considered to be necessary.

Under those statutes which require the killing to be "willful," "purposed," or with "premeditated design," a specific intent to take human life is necessary to raise a murder to the first degree [95] Conversely, a deliberate intentional killing where there are no circumstances rendering the homicide justifiable or excusable is murder in the first degree under such statutes [96] The existence of the intent to kill is not enough to raise the crime to the first degree, the killing must be in pursuance of that intent [97] If the purpose to kill existed, it is not necessary that accused have carried out that purpose himself, he is equally guilty in the first degree if it was executed by an accomplice [98]

An intent to kill need not be directed toward any specific person,[99] and a conditional intent to kill, if carried into effect on the occurrence of the condition, is sufficient [1] For example, it may be murder in the first degree if there is an intent to kill any person who may attempt to do a certain thing, and one is killed because he makes such attempt [2]

Where a single act results in the killing of several, if it is murder in the first degree as to one of the victims, it is murder of the same degree as to the others, as where a single shot is fired killing two men [3]

Intent to kill another It is not ordinarily necessary under the statutes defining murder in the first degree that the specific intent to kill be directed toward the person actually killed, and the crime is, as a general rule, of the first degree if with the specific intent to kill one person accused by accident or mistake killed another,[4] or if, with the formed

First or second degree

Homicide, committed with intent to kill, is, if offense at all, murder in either first or second degree—State v Cooley, 5 P 2d 1005, 165 Wash 638

Motive distinguished

Intent is ripened purpose to effect a result, while motive is the moving power which leads the mind to desire the result and form the purpose—Harden v State, 101 So 442, 211 Ala 656

Premeditated design to effect death

Purpose to kill

The deliberation and premeditation required to constitute murder in the first degree must be connected with the carrying into execution of a fully conscious, no matter how hastily formed, purpose to kill, and not merely a desire to do great bodily harm—Commonwealth v Santos, 119 A 596, 275 Pa 515

design of killing someone although with no definite person in mind, he shot and killed a person whom he did not know,[5] the underlying rule being that, where an act directed toward one person results in the unintentional killing of another, the degree of criminality is the same as though the person toward whom the act was directed had been the victim.[6] There is some authority, however, to the effect that the killing in such case cannot be held to be willful, deliberate, and premeditated,[7] or a killing with express malice[8] within the statutory definition of murder in the first degree. In any event, there must be a legal connection or relation between the original purpose and act and the unexpected result.[9]

b. Particular Classes of Murders

An intent to kill is not an essential element of the crime under some statutes raising particular atrocious killings to murder in the first degree

Frequently under statutes raising particular classes of atrocious killings to murder in the first degree, a specific intent to kill is not an essential element of the crime.

Dangerous act. Under a statute providing that a killing is murder in the first degree when committed by an act imminently dangerous to others, and evincing a depraved mind, regardless of human life, although without a premeditated design to effect the death of any individual, a specific intent to kill someone at the time of the act is not an essential element of the crime.[10]

Killing in perpetration of other felony. An intent to kill ordinarily is not required under those clauses of the statutes making it murder in the first degree where the homicide is committed in the perpetration of a felony,[11] or of any of certain enumerated felonies,[12] or of a crime punishable by

Armed with dangerous weapon

Under statute defining "murder in first degree" as the killing of another while armed with or using a dangerous weapon in the perpetration or attempted perpetration of a robbery, it is not necessary to show that the killing was done purposely to raise the offense to murder in the first degree.—Mumford v. U.S., 130 F.2d 411, 76 U.S.App.D.C. 107, petition denied 63 S.Ct. 53, 317 U.S. 656, 87 L.Ed. —

Intent to commit murder

That accused in perpetration of robbery, had no intent to commit murder while committing robbery, would afford him no defense.—Clark v. State, 276 S.W. 849, 169 Ark. 717

Larceny

Laws 1919 p. 131 § 1, making it a felony to drive away an automobile without the consent of the owner, even though without intent to steal, does not prevent the taking of an automobile with an intent to steal it from being larceny under Remington Code 1915 § 2601, so that a kill-

death or imprisonment for life.[13] However, where the statute provides that any person who purposely and of deliberate and premeditated malice or in the perpetration or attempt to perpetrate certain enumerated felonies shall kill another shall be guilty of murder in the first degree, the intent or purpose to kill is essential.[14]

A statute providing that a homicide committed in the perpetration of a felony is first degree murder "without a design to effect death" does not render absence of intent to kill an essential ingredient of the offense.[15]

Killing by poison. Where the statute declares all murder perpetrated by means of poison to be murder in the first degree, in the case of a homicide committed by the unlawful administration of poison, a specific intent to kill is not necessary.[16] Under a statute which declares that "all murder which shall be perpetrated by means of poison . . or by any other kind of wilful, deliberate or premeditated killing" shall be murder in the first degree, the perpetrator, it has been said, may be held guilty of murder in the first degree without further proof that the death was the ultimate result which the will, deliberation, and premeditation of the party accused sought,[17] but under a statute providing that if any person of sound mind shall "purposely and with premeditated malice . . or by administering poison" kill any human being, he shall be guilty of murder in the first degree, a purpose to kill is essential where the murder is committed by poison.[18]

Killing by means of torture. Under a statute providing that all murder perpetrated by means of torture shall be deemed murder in the first degree, the purpose to kill is conclusively presumed from the intention to perpetrate the torture unlawfully inflicted.[19]

Lying in wait. Where the statute provides that all murder which shall be perpetrated by means of lying in wait or any other kind of willful, deliberate, malicious, or premeditated killing shall be murder in the first degree, in case of murder by lying in wait there is a conclusive legal presumption of malice and guilty intention from the means employed.[20] To the contrary, however, it has been held that, where a homicide was committed by lying in wait, it must have been with an actual intent to kill and not merely to do bodily injury.[21] In a jurisdiction in which a killing must be with express malice in order to constitute murder in the first degree, see infra § 34, a killing by a person lying in wait is not per se murder in the first degree.[22]

Willfulness, deliberation, and premeditation are ordinarily distinctive features of one class of murder in the first degree, and to constitute such crime each of these elements must be present

Ordinarily, under the various statutes dividing murder into degrees, the distinctive features of one class of murder in the first degree are willfulness, deliberation, and premeditation.[23] The elements

described by the words "willful," "deliberate," and "premeditated" respectively as they are employed to characterize the killing in statutes defining murder in the first degree are distinct, and must each be present in order that the homicide may come within the definition [24] For example, under a statute providing that a willful, deliberate, and premeditated killing shall be murder in the first degree it is not murder in the first degree if the homicide is willful and premeditated but is without deliberation,[25] and this is also true under statutes requiring "deliberate and premeditated design"[26] So, likewise, if the element of premeditation is absent, a homicide is not murder in the first degree as a willful, deliberate, and premeditated killing,[27] or as a killing with premeditated malice [28]

Murder committed during robbery

(1) Although murder is committed during perpetration of robbery to constitute murder in the first degree state need not plead and prove that it was so committed if deliberation is shown —State v Moore, 33 S W 2d 905, 326 Mo 1199

(2) In prosecution for killing police officer after accused's attempted robbery, even if jury found that, although there had been an attempt to rob a certain person, the attempted robbery had been completely abandoned at time of shooting, a verdict of guilty of murder of the first degree was warranted if jury found that accused killed the officer willfully, deliberately, and with premeditation —Commonwealth v Kelly 10 A 2d 431, 337 Pa 171

Premeditated design

Under some statutes a premeditated design to effect death is an essential element of one class of murder in the first degree —Forehand v State, 171 So 241, 126 Fla 461—Leavine v State, 147 So 897, 109 Fla 417—Rhodes v State, 110 So 309, 101 Fla 520—Townsend v State, 116 So 7 95 Fla 139—Lowe v State, 105 So 829, 90 Fla 255—Smithie v State, 94 So 156, 84 Fla 498—29 C J p 1112 note 7

Purposely and with premeditated malice

Use of dangerous weapon

Intentional killing by means of dangerous weapon does not constitute murder in the first degree in absence of deliberation and premeditation, except where accused is engaged at time in commission of independent felony —People v Lazar, 2 N E 2d 32, 271 N Y 27

Express malice aforethought

While willfulness, deliberation, and premeditation must all be present and cannot be synchronous, the order in which they take place is not of controlling importance[29] It is not enough that the design to kill existed at the time of the killing,[30] but it must have been formed before it was put into execution[31]

b. Definitions and Distinctions

Among other terms employed in the various statutes defining murder in the first degree, which have received judicial interpretation, "willful" has been defined as intentional, "deliberation" as a thinking over in a cool state of blood, and "premeditation" as the entertaining by the mind of a design to kill prior to the killing

The term "willful" as used by the statutes to characterize a killing which may be murder in the first degree means intentional as distinguished from accidental[32] "Willful" means governed by the will, without yielding to reason[33]

While there is some authority to the contrary,[34] a distinction is ordinarily drawn between the words "deliberate" and "premeditated" as employed in statutory definitions of murder,[35] premeditation consisting in the entertaining by the mind of a design to kill prior to the killing,[36] and deliberation in the weighing of the considerations for and against it,[37] or the determination of whether or not the contemplated act should be done[38] Deliberation means a thinking over with calm and reflective mind,[39] and requires a cool state of blood and the absence of sudden passion caused by lawful or just provocation,[40] while one in a heat of passion may premeditate without deliberating[41] Although a specific intent to take life may be present, the killing, it has been held, is not necessarily deliberate and premeditated,[42] but the words "deliberately" and "premeditatedly" have been defined as meaning the intent to take life with a full and conscious knowledge of the purpose to do so,[43] and it has been said that a very correct definition of the two adjectives "deliberate" and "premeditated" is contained in an instruction to the effect that, "if a person had time to think, and did think, and, after having thought, he struck the blow as the result of a determination produced by the operation of the mind, then that would be a sufficient deliberation and premeditation"[44] A homicide committed for revenge is deliberate[45]

Premeditated design The phrase "premeditated design," as employed in some statutes defining murder in the first degree, has been held to signify merely an intent to kill[46] It is no more or less than a mental purpose to take human life[47]

Deliberate and premeditated design To constitute a deliberate and premeditated design to effect death the act must be deliberate, in the sense that it should not have been committed under the influence of sudden and uncontrollable impulse produced by a proximate cause, and premeditated, in the sense that an intention to inflict injury must have preceded the doing of the act which effected death[48]

Premeditated malice In order to constitute premeditated malice as employed in the definition of murder in the first degree, the thought of taking life must have been consciously conceived in the mind, the conception must have been meditated on, and a deliberate determination formed to do the act[49]

Deliberately premeditated malice aforethought. The phrase "with deliberately premeditated malice aforethought" within the meaning of a statute making murder so committed murder in the first degree means "thought upon, resolved upon beforehand, and not done suddenly," although no particular length of time is required[50] The word "deliberately" does not mean slowly, but refers to the purposeful character of the premeditated malice rather than to the time spent in premeditation[51]

c. Time Requisite for Deliberation or Premeditation

No particular length of time is necessary for deliberation and premeditation. In some jurisdictions the intention to kill and the act of killing may be as instantaneous as successive thoughts of the mind, but elsewhere it is held that there must be an appreciable time sufficient for some reflaction and consideration

No particular length of time is necessary for deliberation and premeditation,[52] as it is the fact of deliberation which is important, rather than the length of time during which it continued[53] The requisite time cannot be measured by any rule other than that furnished by the circumstances of each case,[54] since the time necessary must vary according to the varying temperaments of men and the circumstances under which they are placed[55] It has been variously stated, in terms or effect, that any length of time, however short, is sufficient,[56] that it is sufficient if the purpose of killing is weighed long enough to form a fixed design to kill[57] or a conscious purpose to kill,[58] that it is sufficient if the design is formed even a moment before it is put into execution,[59] or that deliberation and premeditation may have existed but for an instant,[60] and that, if a design to kill has been deliberately formed, it may be instantly carried into effect[61]

In some cases it has been stated that there need be no appreciable time between the formation of the design and its execution,[62] and that the intention to kill and the act of killing may be as instantaneous as successive thoughts of the mind[63] On

'In order that there may be such premeditated malice as will make a killing murder in the first degree the thought of taking life must have been consciously conceived in the mind the conception must have been meditated upon, and a deliberate determination formed to do the act Where the homicide has been preceded by a concurrence of will, with an intention to kill, and these are followed by deliberate thought or premeditation, although they follow as instantaneous as successive thoughts can follow each other, the perpetrator may be guilty of murder in the

the other hand it has also been held that there must be an appreciable time sufficient for some reflection and consideration and the formation of a definite purpose, no matter how brief,[64] that there must be time enough to permit the formation of a distinct purpose to kill and for some reflection and consideration,[65] and that the statement that they may follow each other as two successive thoughts is erroneous,[66] and that time sufficient to form the intention to kill does not necessarily include sufficient time for premeditation and deliberation.[67] The time need not be long enough for defendant to ponder thoroughly over the act and its consequences[68] and he need not have brooded over it,[69] nor need there be a predetermined intention to kill fixed in the mind after a mature reflection and deliberation on the act of killing.[70] The fact that some appreciable time must elapse does not require the lapse of days or hours, or even minutes.[71]

d. Necessity That Killing Result from Deliberation and Premeditation

To constitute one class of murder in the first degree it is ordinarily necessary that the killing result from deliberation and premeditation. Deliberation and premeditation imply the existence of a mental state capable thereof.

It is not sufficient that there shall have been deliberation and premeditation at some time prior to the killing; the killing itself must have been the result thereof.[72] Where a wound is inflicted with intent to kill and is inflicted deliberately and premeditatedly, then the killing is also deliberate and premeditated.[73]

Deliberation and premeditation imply the existence of a mental state capable thereof[74] and deliberation requires a certain degree of mental coolness, as considered supra subdivision b of this section. Thus, although there may have been time for deliberation, if the purpose to kill was formed and immediately executed in a passion,[75] especially if Rapid succession.

In Florida.

(1) Premeditation must exist an appreciable length of time before the killing so that the perpetrator of the act may know and be conscious of the nature and character of the act which he is about to commit and the probable result therefrom in so far as the life of the assaulted person is involved.—Forehand v. State, 171 So. 211, 126 Fla. 461—29 C.J. p. 1115 note 46 [c] (1).

(2) Premeditation need not exist any extended time before the act.—Matthews v. State, 177 So. 321, 130 Fla. 53. Forehand v. State, supra. Hasty v. State, 162 So. 910, 120 Fla. 269.

(3) If the purpose or intention to kill is definitely framed in the mind of the killer and he proceeds to act in the execution of such thought or design the element of premeditation exists.—Milton v. State, 192 So. 219, 140 Fla. 617—Davis v. State, 190 So. 259, 138 Fla. 798.—Forehand v. State, supra.

(4) Where the evidence is sufficient to show that accused had ample time to form a purpose to kill deceased and for the mind of the killer to become fully conscious of its own design it will be deemed sufficient as to point of time in which to enable the killer to form a premeditated design to kill.—Rhodes v. State, 140 So. 309, 104 Fla. 520—Green v. State, 113 So. 121, 93 Fla. 1076.

Incident of mania.

The fatal blow must not have been the incident of mania or a sudden paroxysm or heat of passion such as the passion was aroused by a recent provocation or by mutual combat, the murder is not deliberate and premeditated.[76] However, passion does not always reduce the crime since a man may deliberate, may premeditate, and may intend to kill after premeditation and deliberation, although prompted and to a large extent controlled by passion at the time.[77] If the design to kill was formed with deliberation and premeditation, it is immaterial that defendant was in a passion or excited when the design was carried into effect.[78] Provocation has a bearing on the question of deliberation favorable to accused, just as its absence has an unfavorable bearing.[79] The degree of a deliberate killing committed under provocation but without passion is not reduced.[80] Mere anticipation of trouble with deceased is not sufficient of itself to reduce the degree of crime from murder in the first degree.[81]

e. Classes of Killings Where Deliberation and Premeditation Not Required

The statutes ordinarily do not require deliberation and premeditation in some classes of murder in the first degree, such as in case of a killing in the perpetration of a felony or a killing by lying in wait, by poison, or by torture

Ordinarily under the various statutes dividing murder into degrees deliberate premeditated malice aforethought is not always required to constitute murder in the first degree.[82]

Killing in perpetration of felony Where killing in the perpetration or attempt to perpetrate a felony or one of certain enumerated felonies is made murder in the first degree, the perpetration or attempt to perpetrate the felony is regarded as standing in the place of or as the legal equivalent of the willfulness, deliberation, and premeditation necessary under the statute as to other killings and dispenses with the necessity of proof thereof.[83] Such a statute applies to all homicides committed in the perpetration of the enumerated felonies and not merely to those which might be planned as part of the execution of the felony intended.[84] Where, under the statute, murder in the first degree may consist of a killing in the perpetration of certain enumerated felonies, and where there is no general provision that murder in the first degree may consist of a killing in the perpetration of a felony, a killing in the perpetration of a felony other than one of the enumerated felonies, in order to constitute murder in the first degree, must have been committed deliberately, premeditatedly, and with malice aforethought.[85]

Where the homicide was committed in the perpetration of the crime of an attempt to commit robbery by the use of a deadly weapon, it was unlawful and, in the absence of circumstances in justification or excuse or in extenuation the crime was committed with malice aforethought.—State v. Larceny

Killing by lying in wait Under some statutes deliberation and premeditation are established by lying in wait [86]

Killing by poison Where the statute prescribes that all murder which shall be perpetrated by means of poison or lying in wait or any other kind of willful, deliberate, and premeditated killing shall be murder in the first degree, murder perpetrated by means of poison ordinarily is said to carry with it the conclusive evidence of premeditation and deliberation,[87] but, on the other hand, it has been held that it may be possible that murder may be committed by means of poison and yet not be the result of a willful, deliberate, and premeditated act and hence that under a statute of this character a conviction of murder in the second degree may be legal [88]

Murder by torture Under a statute providing that all murder perpetrated by means of torture shall be deemed murder in the first degree, deliberation is not an essential element of the crime [89] The turpitude of the act of torture supplies the place of deliberate and premeditated malice [90]

Malice is a necessary ingredient of murder in the first degree, and under some statutes the malice must be express malice

Ordinarily, under the various statutes, malice is a necessary ingredient of murder in the first degree [91] The distinction between murder in the first degree and murder in the second degree may lie in the kind of malice present [92] For example to constitute murder in the first degree, or a particular class of murder in the first degree, the malice must be express malice,[93] although under other statutes the malice may be either express or implied [94] Under statutes providing that all murder which shall have been committed in the perpetration of, or attempt to perpetrate, certain crimes shall be murder in the first degree, proof of express malice aforethought is unnecessary,[95] as the malice of the initial offense attaches to whatever else the criminal may do in connection therewith [96]

Willful, deliberate, and premeditated A killing with malice aforethought is not necessarily willful, deliberate, and premeditated so as to be as such murder in the first degree [97] The fact that a killing was with malice aforethought does not show necessarily the presence of the elements of willfulness, deliberation, and premeditation,[98] although a killing which would have been with malice aforethought under the common-law rule is in some jurisdictions held to be a killing with "premeditated design" as the term is employed in a statutory definition [99] However, a murder shown to have been committed on express malice is ordinarily a willful, deliberate,

Killing by means of poison Any intentional killing, committed by means of poison, evidences malice [2] Where the statute makes all murder perpetrated by means of poison murder in the first degree, it does not dispense with the necessity that the killing shall have been with malice aforethought, at least where "murder" is generally defined by statute as the unlawful killing of a human being with malice aforethought [3] Where the statute provides that all murder committed by poison shall be murder in the first degree, the killing may be either with express or implied malice [4]

§ 35. Second Degree

a In general
b Malice
c Intent to kill
d Deliberation and premeditation

a. In General

Where murder is divided into degrees, and murder in the second degree is not specifically defined, murder in the second degree usually is murder which is not accompanied by the distinguishing features of murder in the first degree

The statutes dividing murder into degrees quite frequently provide, after defining murder in the first degree, that all other murder shall constitute murder in the second degree [5] Under statutes of this description, murder in the second degree is common-law murder, but the killing is not accompanied by the distinguishing features of murder in the first degree [6] Some statutes, however, expressly define murder in the second degree or particular classes of homicides which shall constitute murder in the second degree,[7] for example, as an unlawful killing perpetrated by any act imminently dangerous to another and evincing a depraved mind, regardless of human life, although without any premeditated design to effect the death of any particular individual,[8] or an unlawful killing, perpetrated by any act imminently dangerous to others and evincing a depraved mind, regardless of human life, without any premeditated design to effect the death of the person killed or of any human being,[9] or a killing in the performance of an unlawful abortion,[10] or a killing in sudden affray by use of a deadly weapon which was concealed before the commencement of the fight [11] Under some statutes a homicide committed in the perpetration, or attempt-

b. Malice

Malice is an essential element of murder in the second degree

In the absence of a statute to the contrary, the equivalent of common-law malice or malice aforethought must be present to constitute murder in the second degree [13] The malice essential to render a killing a murder in the second degree may be implied malice [14] Under statutes requiring murder in the first degree to be accompanied by actual malice or express malice, murder committed with implied malice is murder in the second degree.[15] Under some statutes requiring in the first degree express malice directed against the actual victim, it is murder in the second degree to kill one person while trying to kill another.[16] Under a statute providing that an unlawful killing perpetrated by any act imminently dangerous to another and evincing a depraved mind regardless of human life, although without any premeditated design to effect the death of any particular individual, shall be murder in the second degree, proof of an intent to kill a particular individual will not exclude a conviction for murder in that degree.[17]

c. Intent to Kill

A specific intent to kill ordinarily is not an element of murder in the second degree, although under some statutes an intent to kill is necessary

Under many of the statutes a specific intent to kill is not an essential element of murder in the second degree.[18] So it may be murder in the second degree where the intent is merely to cause great bodily harm,[19] or to produce an unlawful abortion,[20] or to perpetrate any unlawful act[21] The absence of an intent to kill frequently operates to reduce the crime from the first to the second degree,[22] although the presence of an intent to kill is not necessarily inconsistent with guilt of murder in the second degree[23]

On the other hand, under some statutes an intent to kill is required,[24] as where murder in the second degree is defined as a homicide committed purposely and maliciously, but without premeditation,[25] or without deliberation and premeditation[26]

d. Deliberation and Premeditation

Deliberation and premeditation ordinarily are not made elements of murder in the second degree

imminently dangerous to another, and evincing a depraved mind regardless of human life, although without any premeditated design to effect the death of any particular individual,[33] or when committed in the commission of a felony other than the specific felonies mentioned in the definition of murder in the first degree purposely and maliciously, but without deliberation and premeditation.[34] In some jurisdictions, however, murder in the second degree is defined as the killing of a human being willfully, premeditatedly and with malice aforethought,[35] but without deliberation.[36]

Effect of passion and provocation Under the view that deliberation is a distinguishing feature of murder in the first degree, a killing under the influence of passion induced by provocation insufficient to reduce the grade of the offense to manslaughter, see infra § 46, may be murder in the second degree.[37] Where express malice is a necessary element of murder in the first degree, see supra § 34, a malicious killing is murder in the second degree where the intent is formed in passion and is carried out before cooling time ensues.[38]

§ 36. Third and Lesser Degrees

Some statutes dividing murder into degrees provide for a third or a lesser degree of murder.

By some statutes particular homicides are made murder in the third degree,[39] as, for example, a homicide perpetrated by an act imminently dangerous to others and evincing a depraved mind, regardless of human life, although without a premeditated design to effect death,[40] or a homicide, without a design to effect death, by a person engaged in the commission of, or an attempt to commit, a felony,[41] or a felony other than those enumerated in the definition of the first degree.[42] Under such a statute no intent to effect death is necessary, but the fact that death is caused by a person in the commission of a felony is sufficient.[43] Indeed an intentional murder does not come under this clause,[44] although it is said that murder unintentionally committed in an attempt to commit mayhem would be within its scope.[45]

Fourth and fifth degrees Under some statutes a further division of murder as far as a fourth[46] or fifth[47] degree has existed.

killing of another without malice either express or implied,[51] and without premeditation and deliberation.[52] However, it has also been said that the reference to manslaughter as being without malice needs close scrutiny, and that malice in the sense of general criminal intent does exist in manslaughter.[53]

The motive for the crime is not an important factor[54] nor is the nature of the means or instrumentality used for the killing material, since any means or instrument may be used.[55]

Voluntary and involuntary manslaughter; intent. Manslaughter is generally divided into two classes, voluntary manslaughter and involuntary manslaughter,[56] which are considered in detail infra §§ 40–63, although, as appears infra § 38, under some statutes defining the offense, this distinction is not recognized or one of the classes is done away with. In general, the difference between the two classes is that voluntary manslaughter is intentional and involuntary manslaughter is unintentional[57] Thus, it has been said, concerning manslaughter generally, that a specific intent to kill is not an essential element of the offense,[58] although it may be present,[59] as in voluntary manslaughter, as considered infra § 44

Other homicides distinguished Manslaughter is distinguished from nonfelonious homicide generally, which is considered infra §§ 97–113, by the absence of circumstances excusing or justifying the killing,[60] and from homicide per infortunium or by misadventure, which is considered infra § 112, in that in the latter death ensues accidentally as a result of a lawful act, done without intention of bodily harm to any person[61] The distinction between murder and manslaughter is considered supra § 14 "Self-defense" is distinguished from "manslaughter" infra § 116

§ 38. Statutory Provisions

The effect of statutes defining and punishing manslaughter depends on their terms They may do away with the offense as such and make the offense of murder without malice the equivalent of voluntary manslaughter, and the offense of negligent homicide the equivalent of involuntary manslaughter.

The common-law definition of "manslaughter," as considered supra § 37, is generally applied under statutes which provide a punishment for manslaughter without defining the offense,[62] or which define it substantially according to the common law[63] Under other statutes so providing, which more or less change or supplement the common-law definition,[64] it has variously been held that manslaughter is the killing of a human being without a design to effect death in the heat of passion, but in a cruel and unusual manner, unless it is under circumstances that would constitute excusable or justifiable homicide,[65] or that it is a killing without authority of law, which is not specifically provided for by other statutory provisions,[66] or is an unlawful killing of another except as described in the statutory definition of murder,[67] or is the killing of a human being by the act, procurement, or culpable negligence of another in cases where such killing is not justifiable or excusable homicide or murder as defined by the statute[68] Manslaughter may, under statutory provisions, include an unnecessary killing of another, either while resisting an attempt by such other person to commit a felony, or to do any other unlawful act, or after such attempt shall have failed [69]

Amendment An amendment to the manslaughter statute providing that in cases of involuntary manslaughter the punishment should be in the discretion of the court has been held not to repeal the manslaughter statute and has set up in its stead involuntary manslaughter as a misdemeanor [70]

Effect on distinction between voluntary and involuntary manslaughter Under some statutes which define "manslaughter," there is no such crime as involuntary manslaughter,[71] although a portion of the statutory definition of "manslaughter" may follow closely the definition of "involuntary manslaughter" at common law [72] So, where the statute simply provides that, on trials for murder, the jury may find the prisoner guilty of manslaughter, there is no such crime as involuntary manslaughter [73] However, it has also been held that, where the statutes define and punish the crime of voluntary manslaughter only, the common-law offense of manslaughter is in effect subdivided into the statutory offense of voluntary manslaughter, and the offense of involuntary manslaughter, which remains as a common-law offense,[74] and that there is no longer any such offense as simply manslaughter [75]

Where, by the statutory definition of "murder," all killings with a design to effect the death of the person killed or of another are made murder either in the first or second degree, there can be no voluntary manslaughter [76] Under some statutes defining "manslaughter" and dividing it into degrees, the absence of a design to effect death is essential to each of the degrees [77] Where a statute makes any unlawful and willful killing of a human being without malice manslaughter, the common-law distinction between voluntary and involuntary manslaughter is immaterial,[78] and such a statute will, for example, include a negligent killing which is also willful [79]

Degrees of manslaughter While, under some statutes, the crime of manslaughter is divided into degrees, as considered infra §§ 64, 67, such division is not essential, and a statute defining "manslaughter" in general terms is not void because it does not separate the crime into degrees [80]

Statutes expressly relating to abortions In some jurisdictions, under statutes expressly so providing, it is manslaughter to kill an unborn child after it has quickened [81] Under other statutes so providing, the death of the mother or child resulting from the administration to a pregnant woman of any drug or the employment of any other means with intent to destroy the child is manslaughter, unless such act is necessary to preserve the life of the mother,[82] and under such statutes it has been held not necessary that the fetus be quick or able to move[83] Under some statutes, it is immaterial whether the death of the child was intended, if it would have been murder had the mother died from the operation,[84] but others require an intent to destroy the child,[85] and such statutes have been held not to apply to a woman who commits an abortion on herself[86] Under a statute to that effect, one using instruments or other means to produce an abortion in the belief that the woman is pregnant is guilty of manslaughter if the woman dies as a result thereof, even though she is not actually pregnant[87]

In Texas a statute defining and punishing manslaughter as a voluntary homicide committed under the influence of sudden passion arising from an adequate cause[88] has been repealed[89] The effect of the repealing statute was to repeal also all statutes which specified certain acts as constituting adequate cause for reducing the degree of homicide[90] Since the repealing statute contained an amendment so providing, offenses committed prior to its effective date were not affected thereby, but were governed by the earlier manslaughter statute,[91] and such amendment, although it became effective before the repealing statute, was not repealed when the latter became effective.[92]

Murder without malice. Under a statutory provision to that effect it has been held in Texas that, if one kills another without justification, under the immediate influence of sudden passion, aroused by an adequate cause, he is guilty of murder without malice[93]

Negligent homicide. In Texas there is no such crime as "involuntary manslaughter" eo nomine, but the statute has substituted what is termed "negligent homicide," which consists in the doing of an act, lawful or unlawful, in a careless or negligent manner,[94] when there is apparent danger of causing the death of the person killed or some other,[95] but with no apparent intention to kill[96] The homicide must be the consequence of the act done or attempted to be done[97]

Negligent homicide in the first degree is the killing of another by negligence and carelessness in the performance of a lawful act,[98] a lawful act being an act which is not forbidden by the penal law and which would not give just occasion for a civil action,[99] it being required that there must be ap-

Lawfulness of act apart from negligence

The negligence cannot be regarded as rendering the act unlawful within this rule, and a statute authorizing action for wrongful death was parent danger of causing the death of the person killed or some other person,[1] and the degree of care and caution required to prevent one from being guilty of such homicide being defined as such as a man of ordinary prudence would use under like circumstances.[2]

Negligent homicide in the second degree, which is made subject to the provisions with respect to such homicide in the first degree, except as otherwise provided, is the killing of another by negligence[3] in the performance of an unlawful act,[4] an "unlawful act" being defined as an act constituting a misdemeanor or giving just occasion for a civil action,[5] and killing in committing or attempting a felony being expressly excluded.[6]

There is a fundamental difference between the two degrees of negligent homicide,[7] so that, when a negligent homicide results from one transaction, accused cannot be found guilty of both offenses.[8]

§ 39. Status as Distinct Offense or as Degree of Murder

Manslaughter is a distinct crime, and not a degree of murder, although sometimes it is classed as a degree of felonious homicide.

Manslaughter is a distinct crime and does not constitute a degree of murder,[9] although it has been sometimes classed as a degree of felonious homicide.[10]

B VOLUNTARY MANSLAUGHTER

§ 40. Definition

"Voluntary manslaughter" has been defined as the unlawful killing of another intentionally, but in a sudden heat of passion due to adequate provocation, and not with malice.

Where a homicide is neither justifiable nor malicious but is intentional, it is voluntary manslaughter.[11] More specifically, "voluntary manslaughter," as defined at common law and under statutes declaratory thereof, is substantially, the unlawful killing of another intentionally, but in a sudden heat of passion due to adequate provocation, and not with malice.[12] By statute in some jurisdictions, "voluntary manslaughter" is defined as the unlawful

§ 41. Elements and Nature of Offense

The elements of self-defense are not essential to manslaughter, and the means used are immaterial.

The elements of voluntary manslaughter are considered specifically infra §§ 42–54 In general, the elements necessary to establish self-defense, as discussed, infra §§ 114–138, are not essential to reduce a homicide from murder to manslaughter[15]

Means or instrumentality used In the absence of statute changing the rule, the nature of the means or instrumentality used in the commission of the homicide is immaterial in determining whether the offense constitutes voluntary manslaughter[16]

§ 42. —— Sudden Passion Due to Adequate Provocation

With few exceptions, an intentional homicide may be reduced from murder to manslaughter only where it was committed in a sudden heat of passion caused by adequate provocation The requisite passion may be the result of rage, anger, fright, or terror, and must be of such a degree as would cause an ordinary man to act on impulse and without reflection

If an intentional, unlawful, homicide, which might otherwise be murder, was committed in a sudden heat of passion, caused by adequate provocation, technical malice being lacking, the crime is reduced to manslaughter,[17] and, except as hereinafter stated, such passion is essential to reduce a killing from murder to manslaughter [18]

Character of passion The passion ordinarily required to reduce a killing to the grade of manslaughter is that created by rage or anger [19] However, the passion may be one resulting from other conditions of the mind rendering it incapable of cool reflection,[20] such as fright or terror [21]

Degree of passion Passion in order to reduce murder to manslaughter must be of such a degree as would cause an ordinary man to act on impulse and without reflection [22] Stated otherwise, the passion must be irresistible,[23] or almost uncontrollable,[24] or such as to render the person beyond the power of self-control[25] or for the time being deaf to the voice of reason,[26] or such as temporarily to suspend or overthrow the reason or judgment by its violence,[27] or naturally to destroy the sway of reason and render the mind of an ordinary person incapable of cool reflection,[28] or it must produce what, according to human experience, may be called an uncontrollable impulse to do violence [29] Accused must have been aroused to the highest degree of exasperation [30] The heat of passion must be such as to exclude premeditation and a previously formed design,[31] and, under some statutes, anger when not of such a character as to render the mind incapable of forming a premeditated design to effect the death of deceased or some other human being will not reduce an unlawful killing from murder to manslaughter [32]

The passion need not be such as to dethrone reason,[33] or temporarily dethrone reason,[34] or be so overpowering as to destroy volition or the reasoning faculties,[35] or so overpowering as for the time to shut out knowledge and destroy volition,[36] or to render the person accused incapable of deliberation or premeditation,[37] or be uncontrollable,[38] nor need there have been "a whirl-wind" of passion,[39] or a "transport" of passion [40]

Apprehension of danger, imperfect self-defense As has been stated passion resulting from fright or terror may be sufficient to reduce a homicide from murder to manslaughter, and such a killing may be closely akin to a killing in self-defense [41] In this connection it has been held that in certain circumstances a homicide may be reduced from murder to manslaughter, even though the killing was not done in the heat of passion,[42] as where the killing was done because the slayer believed that he was in great danger, although the facts did not warrant such a belief,[43] or, where there is a case of imperfect self-defense, that is, where the slayer, although acting in self-defense was not himself free from blame,[44] as where the difficulty was originally provoked by accused, as considered infra § 46

Although the right to kill in self-defense may have terminated, nevertheless a heat of passion created by the attending circumstances may continue so that the killing will be manslaughter and not murder.[45] Where the circumstances of the killing are such as may indicate that the person killed by his conduct had provoked passion on the part of the slayer, and also that the slayer may have acted in self-defense, the two theories are not so contradictory that they may not both be considered, and, although it may be found that the theory of self-defense is not supported, the theory of a killing under the influence of passion on adequate provocation may be found to have been established.[46]

§ 43. —— Sudden Combat or Affray

A killing ensuing from a sudden transport of passion or heat of blood, in sudden combat or affray, is manslaughter.

At common law a killing ensuing from a sudden transport of passion or heat of blood, if in sudden combat, was also manslaughter,[47] and the statutory definition of voluntary manslaughter has in some jurisdictions been made expressly to include a killing without malice in a sudden affray.[48] However, a sudden combat is ordinarily considered on the same footing as other provocations operating to create such passion as temporarily to unseat the judgment.[49]

"Sudden affray" has been defined as a difficulty or fight suddenly resulting from the mutual agreement of two or more parties,[50] and is not synonymous with the term "sudden heat and passion."[51]

§ 44. —— Intent; Willfulness

To constitute voluntary manslaughter the killing must be willful or intentional, although intent may be inferred, and reckless or wanton conduct, particularly with a deadly weapon, may be sufficient.

While a specific intent to kill is not an essential element of manslaughter, although it may be present, as considered supra § 37, nevertheless, except as appears below, to constitute voluntary manslaughter, the killing not only may, but must, be willful or intentional.[52] However, it has been held that a

As rebutting inference of malice

Although fright will not excuse the unnecessary taking of human life when there is no reasonable ground for apprehending death or enormous bodily harm, it may serve to repel the inference of malice and reduce the homicide to manslaughter, if the killing was done because the slayer believed he was in great danger but the facts did not warrant such belief.—State v. At least voluntary manslaughter killing in the course of the commission of a felony may be voluntary manslaughter provided the killing was wholly unintentional, as by mistake, and without intent to wound or kill [53]

The existence of sudden and irresistible passion has been held to be inconsistent with the notion of intention,[54] but the difference is reconciled on the ground that the law disregards the actual intent,[55] or accused will be presumed not to have been actuated thereby [56] It has been held to be voluntary manslaughter in some jurisdictions where, although there is no evidence of an intent to kill, death results from an intentional and unlawful blow [57] It has been held difficult to reconcile the absence of malice with the presence of an intent to kill, where a statute defines "malice" as an intent to do a wrongful act established either by proof or presumption of law [58]

Inference of intent, reckless conduct Notwithstanding there is no showing of an intention to kill, such intention may be inferred from the acts of accused,[59] or may be founded on a manifest or reckless disregard for the safety of human life [60] Thus an intention to kill may be inferred from the willful use of a deadly weapon,[61] but, if the weapon is not deadly, the intent to kill cannot be inferred, but must appear from the evidence [62] However, it has been held that, if it is established that there was in fact no intent, the killing is at most involuntary manslaughter [63]

In at least one jurisdiction, it is also held that a homicide will constitute voluntary manslaughter where it was committed under such circumstances as to appear so reckless and wanton, or so grossly careless and negligent, as to be felonious, although not intended [64] Thus one may be guilty of voluntary manslaughter where death results from the reckless and careless use or handling of a deadly weapon,[65] or from shooting in a wanton, reckless,

Homicide occasioned by ordinary negligence in handling of deadly weapons as involuntary manslaughter see infra § 62 b

Basis of rule

"The principle is based upon the theory that a man intends the natural consequences of his acts and what he is aware of or ought to be aware will result from the handling and careless manner,[66] or from other acts manifestly dangerous to life[67]

Intention directed toward third person Where a shot or blow aimed at one person by a misadventure kills another, it is manslaughter if the homicide would have been of that grade had the person, against whom the blow or shot was directed, been killed,[68] and the same rule has been applied where a killing was through mistake as to the identity of the person killed[69]

Willfully Where a statute provides that the killing must be done unlawfully and willfully, the term "willfully" will be construed as meaning acting voluntarily with evil intent or design[70] Such willfulness may be shown by the fact that accused acted with reckless disregard of the life of another and that the means used were reasonably calculated to take such life[71]

§ 45. —— Absence of Malice

The absence of malice is essential to the crime of voluntary manslaughter, and if, notwithstanding the existence of passion, a homicide was committed with malice, it is murder and not manslaughter.

In accordance with the generally accepted rule considered supra § 37, malice, express or implied, is not an essential element of manslaughter,[72] and, in fact, the absence of malice is essential to the crime of voluntary manslaughter, both at common law and under the statutes,[73] this being the characteristic which distinguishes it from murder, as considered supra § 14 Therefore, an intentional homicide, if not justifiable or excusable, is murder and not manslaughter, even though there may have been adequate provocation, if the provocation did not actually cause a sufficient degree of passion, or if the homicide was the result, not of passion, but of malice[74] This is so even though a violent passion was aroused by the provocation,[75] and it is so in

of a weapon in a way dangerous to life although he actually has no intention to kill"—Jones v Commonwealth, 252 S W 130, 134, 200 Ky 65 —Davis v Commonwealth, 237 S W 24, 25, 193 Ky 597, 23 A L R 1551

Preventing aid for wounded man

If refusal to permit wounded person to obtain aid or medical attention or to render it where duty to render it exists, is so grossly negligent or reckless as to manifest wanton disregard for human life, rather than a specific intent to bring about death, the offenders may be guilty of voluntary manslaughter, but, where a shooting was intentional the crime is murder or voluntary manslaughter without more, so that gross negligence or wanton recklessness in failing to furnish or permit medical aid to deceased is immaterial—King v Commonwealth, 148 S W 2d 1044, 285 Ky 654

cases where the homicide was due to a prior grudge or there was a prior intent to kill and accused took advantage of the provocation to carry out such intent,[76] especially if accused used a deadly weapon, prepared for that purpose,[77] unless the murderous purpose can be shown to have been abandoned before the crime was committed.[78]

While the fact that accused had the weapon ready when he provoked the encounter, and immediately killed deceased with it, indicates prior malice,[79] the circumstances may show that the killing was not malicious, although accused used, and even though he had prepared, a deadly weapon.[80] The mere fact that accused armed himself after a quarrel with deceased does not necessarily prevent the subsequent killing from being reduced to manslaughter,[81] for if he armed himself because of a reasonable belief that he was in danger of death or of great bodily harm at the hands of deceased, the homicide is manslaughter if it would have been manslaughter had accused not especially armed himself,[82] but if he armed himself to pursue his adversary, after their quarrel, to get an opportunity to kill him, it is murder.[83]

§ 46. —— Provocation in General

a. In general
b. Original provocation by accused

a. In General

Provocation is a necessary element of voluntary manslaughter, but provocation and passion must concur. The provocation must be sufficient to produce the required degree of passion in an ordinary, average, or reasonable man

In accordance with the rule, considered supra § 42, that the grade of a felonious homicide committed on sudden heat of passion aroused by adequate provocation is reduced from murder to manslaughter, provocation is a necessary element of voluntary manslaughter.[84] However, the homicide will be reduced to voluntary manslaughter only when all the elements concur,[85] and neither passion alone, however violent,[86] nor provocation alone, however adequate,[87] will have this effect.

Nature and sufficiency of provocation required. In order to reduce a homicide to manslaughter, the provocation must be adequate or such as the law deems sufficient to produce the degree of passion required to mitigate the crime,[88] or, stated otherwise, it has been held that the provocation must be considerable,[89] or reasonable,[90] or legal,[91] or lawful,[92] and all of these expressions have been said to be interchangeable and synonymous.[93] The sufficiency of particular acts or circumstances as provocation is considered infra §§ 47–51

The provocation must be of such a character as would naturally or reasonably arouse the passion of an ordinary, average, or reasonable man to the required degree,[94] and it should be real or so apparent as to justify the assumption of its reality.[95]

A slight provocation will not be adequate, since the provocation must be proportionate to the manner in which accused retaliated, and therefore, if accused on a slight provocation, attacked deceased with violence out of all proportion to the provocation and killed him, the crime is murder, although there was no prior intent to take life.[96] This is especially true if the homicide was committed with a deadly weapon, and in such cases there must be some great provocation to reduce the grade,[97] but if the provocation was legally adequate, use of a deadly weapon does not prevent the homicide from being reduced to manslaughter.[98]

The fact that the statute enumerates certain causes from which passion characterizing a killing of manslaughter may arise does not exclude other causes.[99]

b. Original Provocation by Accused

Where accused provokes a difficulty to obtain an opportunity to kill, the homicide is not manslaughter, and in other circumstances deceased's assault, provoked by accused, has been held not to be adequate provocation, but if the difficulty was provoked without felonious intent, a killing in self-defense, or in passion aroused by deceased's assault, will be manslaughter.

Where a difficulty is provoked by accused for the purpose of obtaining an opportunity to kill or do great bodily harm, the homicide cannot be manslaughter.[1] Moreover, under other circumstances, it has been held that accused cannot claim the benefit of a sudden passion aroused by an assault made by deceased, but which was provoked by accused,[2] and an act which standing alone might be adequate provocation may not be such provocation when in itself provoked by the conduct of accused,[3] as where an insult provokes a battery not disproportionate thereto.[4]

No felonious intent, imperfect self-defense The mere fact that the killing occurs in a difficulty begun or provoked by accused will not prevent the grade of the homicide from being manslaughter, if it was provoked without felonious intent.[5] Thus, where a fatal blow is struck in anger or fear suddenly aroused by an assault made on accused by decedent, which constituted a provocation apparently sufficient to make the passion irresistible, the grade of the offense will be manslaughter, even though accused was at fault in provoking the difficulty,[6] and, if the difficulty was provoked without felonious intent, accused has the right, sometimes described as imperfect self-defense, to have the homicide committed in defending himself against deceased's assault reduced to manslaughter.[7] This is so even though the assault of deceased was not of such apparent force as would justify accused in killing in self-defense.[8] Illustrations of killings of this character occur, where an assault by accused is returned with a violence which is manifestly disproportionate to its character.[9]

§ 47. —— Words or Gestures

In general, mere words or gestures, whether offensive, insulting, abusive, or threatening, are not sufficient provocation to reduce a homicide, committed in a passion provoked thereby, to manslaughter

While there is some authority to the contrary,[10] mere words or gestures, however offensive, insulting, or abusive they may be, are not, according to the great weight of authority, adequate to reduce a homicide, although committed in a passion provoked by them, from murder to manslaughter,[11] especially when the homicide was intentionally committed with a deadly weapon,[12] and this rule is embodied in

If accused and his father restrained and falsely imprisoned deceased by force or threats of the show of a weapon, and thereby compelled him to submit to being tied and to agree that he might be carried to the county seat, even though their purpose was to do him no other harm, such acts would be unlawful and if, in an effort to regain his freedom, deceased made an assault on the father, in which accused believed he used more force than was reasonably necessary and in response to which accused took the life of deceased, accused might be guilty of no higher offense than manslaughter under the doctrine of imperfect self-defense —Meador v State, 253 S W 297, 94 Tex Cr 608

express statutory provisions in some jurisdictions.[13]

Threatening words or gestures. Threats or threatening gestures ordinarily are not regarded as in themselves adequate provocation,[14] although there is some contrary authority,[15] particularly where the threat is accompanied by acts showing a purpose to commit personal violence on accused.[16]

Insulting words with other insufficient provocation. Insulting words, coupled with other conduct that by itself would not amount to adequate provocation, usually will not reduce the grade of the crime,[17] but under special circumstances may do so.[18]

If insulting words provoke a combat in which at first there is no intent to kill, but such intent is later formed and executed in the heat of passion caused by the combat, the provocation is sufficient to reduce the grade,[19] but accused's retaliation when provoked by insulting words must not have been excessive, and if, on such provocation, he made a violent attack with a weapon on deceased and ultimately killed him, the grade is not reduced, although after the beginning of the attack the mutual combat became so violent that it would have been sufficient provocation, but for the excessive force originally used by accused.[20]

Insult toward female relative. In the absence of statute, defamatory words concerning, or insults to, female relatives of accused ordinarily are not regarded as sufficient provocation to reduce the grade of a homicide to manslaughter,[21] although there is some authority to the contrary.[22]

In Texas, however, it was held under a statute expressly so providing, which statute has since been repealed, see supra § 38 b, that insulting words or conduct of the person killed toward a female relative of the person committing the homicide were adequate cause for sudden passion.[23] Under such a statute it is immaterial whether or not the female was present when the insulting words were used concerning her,[24] or whether she is then living or dead.[25] It has been said that the statute applies to a homicide committed by a woman in a passion produced by insulting remarks concerning her female relatives,[26] but that it does not apply to a homicide committed in such passion aroused by an insult toward her.[27] Such a statute does not apply to an insult to any male relative, however feeble, infirm, or beloved,[28] nor does it apply to an insult directed at accused and only indirectly affecting his female relatives.[29] Accused must have been in a passion caused by the provocation at the time of the killing,[30] and, if present at the time of the insulting words or conduct, must have acted at once.[31]

Where accused was not present but is informed of the insult by others, the killing may occur at his first meeting with deceased after learning of the provocation and while still affected by the passion springing therefrom,[32] and the mere lapse of time before such meeting does not of itself affect the rule.[33] The meeting may be casual or intended[34] and there need be no new provocation.[35] However, where the killing does not occur at the first meeting, the statute does not apply,[36] although accused was unarmed at the prior meeting,[37] unless a new provocation is given at the subsequent meeting[38]

Since, under the statute, the important factor is the effect produced on accused's mind,[39] it is immaterial whether the information on which he acted is true if it is in fact believed by him,[40] and, conversely, accused must have had knowledge of the insult before the killing,[41] and must have believed the untruth of the statements constituting the alleged insult[42]

§ 48. —— Personal Violence

a In general
b Mutual combat
c Injury to relative or third person

a. In General

Personal violence, if not so trivial as to be disproportionate to the violence of the retaliation, is adequate provocation In general, acts of the deceased putting the accused in apparent imminent danger are adequate, but the lawful exercise of force by the deceased is not adequate provocation

A blow or other personal violence inflicted on accused may constitute adequate provocation,[43] provided it is of such a character or inflicted under such circumstances as to be reasonably calculated to arouse passion,[44] and provided the killing is due to passion so aroused and not to malice[45]

A trivial[46] or slight[47] assault and battery entirely disproportionate to the violence of the retaliation will not constitute an adequate provocation However, in order to reduce the grade of the homicide, the assault need not be so violent as to put accused in imminent danger of death[48] or of such grievous bodily injury as might reasonably cause death,[49] and there is authority that the adequacy of the provocation does not depend on the degree of violence used, but on whether the assault, under the attending circumstances, is calculated to create, and does create, sudden heat of passion[50]

Imminent danger of personal violence While it has been held that acts of deceased from which accused could reasonably draw the conclusion that he was in imminent danger of personal violence constitute adequate provocation,[51] it has also been held that nothing less than actual violence to the person will constitute adequate provocation, a demonstration with a deadly weapon imminently threatening danger not being sufficient [52] The sufficiency of accused's apprehension of danger to reduce a homicide from murder to manslaughter is considered supra § 42

Lawful exercise of force The lawful exercise of force is not such provocation as will reduce a homicide to manslaughter,[53] nor will the heat of passion aroused in mutual combat mitigate the killing where accused was trying to attack a third person and deceased interfered solely for the purpose of preventing the difficulty,[54] using no unnecessary violence [55]

Statutory provisions Under a statute so providing, it has been held that an adequate provocation may lie in an assault and battery by the victim causing pain or bloodshed [56] Under other statutes to that effect it has been held that to constitute adequate provocation there must be an actual assault or an attempt by the person killed to commit a serious personal injury on the person killing,[57] or other equivalent circumstances,[58] or a serious and highly provoking injury inflicted on the person killing [59]

b. Mutual Combat

A homicide resulting from mutual combat or the excitement and heat of passion arising therefrom is voluntary manslaughter There must be a mutual intention to fight, and, it has been held, deadly or dangerous weapons must be used

A homicide is voluntary manslaughter, rather than murder, where it results from mutual combat, or the excitement and heat of passion arising therefrom,[60] even though accused may not have attempted to retire from the conflict,[61] provided the killing was not due to malice,[62] but to the heat of passion aroused by the combat [63] So it may be

As separate type of voluntary manslaughter

It has been held that voluntary manslaughter "is of two types, distinguished by the motivating facts which prompt the act rather than the ends to be obtained, the one being based upon passion supposed to be irresistible and the other on the principle of mutual combat"—Watson v State, 17 S E 2d 559, 560, 66 Ga App 242 manslaughter where the homicide is committed after the combat has terminated but before the passion has subsided,[64] although, if not under the influence of passion so aroused, it is murder.[65]

However, if accused or both accused and deceased entered the combat with the intention of killing, the heat of passion engendered by the mutual combat will not reduce the homicide to manslaughter.[66] Likewise if accused entered the combat dangerously armed and took an unfair advantage of deceased, malice is evidenced and the homicide is not reduced to manslaughter,[67] although, if accused did not intend to use the deadly weapon when he began the contest, but used it in the heat of passion in consequence of an attack made on him, it is manslaughter.[68]

What constitutes combat To constitute a mutual combat within this rule, the persons must have had a mutual intent to fight,[69] but it is not necessary that both persons shall have struck blows or fired shots,[70] as where the first blow or shot killed one of the participants.[71] While it has been held that the rule is especially applicable if deceased used a dangerous weapon,[72] it has also been held to be usually or generally necessary that both persons have been armed with deadly or dangerous weapons,[73] and that mutual combat does not mean a mere fist fight or scuffle.[74]

c. Injury to Relative or Third Person

In general, injury or violence to a relative or friend in the presence of the accused is adequate provocation, but mere information of the injury after it has occurred generally is insufficient.

It has been held to be sufficient provocation, so as to reduce a homicide to manslaughter, provided the killing was committed under the immediate influence of the heat of passion caused thereby,[75] that deceased committed personal violence, in the presence of accused, on accused's wife,[76] father,[77] mother,[78] brother,[79] or child,[80] although it has also been held that an assault causing pain or bloodshed made on one other than the slayer is not of itself adequate, so as to reduce the homicide to manslaughter.[81] However, while there is some authority to the contrary,[82] mere information of the injury after it has occurred, even though it be a rape or attack on accused's wife, has been held insufficient provocation.[83]

ty of a friend is provocation sufficient to mitigate a killing in his defense,[84] there is also cogent authority to the contrary,[85] and it has been held that the fact that accused knew that deceased had killed his friend is not adequate provocation, if the killing did not take place in the presence of accused.[86]

Interference in fight One who interfered in a fight between decedent and a third person wherein decedent had been the aggressor is guilty of manslaughter if, using more force than was reasonably necessary for the protection of the third person, he killed decedent where the interference was not in pursuance of a previously formed design,[87] although, on the other hand, it has been held that, where one who was neither assaulted nor threatened got down from his horse, armed himself with a club, interposed himself between two other persons who were about to engage in a fight, and killed one of them, he is guilty of murder.[88]

§ 49. —— Adultery and Other Illicit Intercourse

The killing of a spouse or the paramour in a heat of passion resulting from discovering them in the act of adultery is manslaughter; but it is not generally manslaughter where the passion is based on mere suspicion or on information of past adultery. These rules have been applied with respect to the illicit intercourse of other relatives.

If a husband detects his wife in the act of adultery, there is sufficient provocation to reduce the homicide to manslaughter if he immediately kills either the wife or her paramour,[89] provided the killing is due to passion aroused by the provocation and not to revenge or malice.[90] In general it is held or said that he must see them in the act, or that he must at least find them together under circumstances reasonably leading him to believe that they are or have been so engaged, and not kill merely on information of past adultery,[91] but it has also been held that such a homicide may be reduced to manslaughter if committed in the heat of passion on being informed of the wife's adultery if the jury find that the circumstances were such as reasonably to cause heat of passion.[92] Mere suspicion is not sufficient provocation,[93] nor is a belief on the part of accused, that his wife, whom he killed, was about to commit adultery.[94]

Illicit intercourse of one other than spouse Although there is authority to the contrary,[96] there are cases tending to show that the principles above stated apply where a father[97] or brother[98] kills one whom he detects in adultery or illicit intercourse with his daughter or sister, or where one kills a man detected in sexual intercourse with his betrothed,[99] and in like cases [1] The courts have, however, refused to extend the rules to a mistress of accused [2] The mere agent of a husband for the purpose of detecting his wife's adultery cannot set up her adultery to reduce his murder of her paramour to manslaughter [3]

§ 50. —— Arrests, Detentions, or Other Acts in Discharge of Public Duty

a In general
b Unlawful arrests, detentions, or other acts

a. In General

Homicide in resisting arrest, detention, or other lawful act of an officer in the course of his duties is not manslaughter, unless the arrest is made, or the act done, in an unlawful manner, or the accused is unaware of its legality

A lawful arrest or detention in a lawful manner by an officer or private person will not constitute an adequate provocation for heat of passion reducing the grade of the homicide to manslaughter,[4] nor will other lawful acts of officers while in the discharge of their duties constitute adequate provocation [5] Lawful restraint by a private person is not adequate provocation [6]

Lawful arrest in unlawful manner The killing may be only manslaughter where a legal arrest is attempted in an unlawful manner, as where the passion of accused is aroused by the employment of unnecessary violence [7]

Knowledge of legality of arrest It has been said that accused must have known that the officer was acting under authority and intended to arrest, in order to prevent the homicide from being reduced to manslaughter,[8] and it has been held that the killing may be only manslaughter where the officer failed to notify accused of the official character of the arrest as he may be required to do,[9] unless accused knew he was being rightfully arrested [10]

b. Unlawful Arrests, Detentions, or Other Acts

An illegal arrest, detention, or similar act is adequate provocation to reduce a homicide committed in resisting it to manslaughter, at least if the accused knew of its illegality

As the rule is ordinarily stated, an illegal arrest or attempt to arrest is adequate provocation to reduce a homicide to manslaughter,[11] unless the homicide was in fact committed with malice,[12] the absence of which is not necessarily established by the fact that the arrest or attempt to arrest was illegal.[13] In order to permit the application of the doctrine there must not only have been an illegal arrest but the killing must have been done in actual resistance to the act of making the arrest and retaining illegal custody of accused.[14] A mere declaration of an intent to make an illegal arrest unaccompanied by an attempt to do so is not adequate provocation.[15]

The rules as to provocation occasioned by an illegal arrest have been also applied to cases of other illegal or unauthorized violences by an officer[16] or of illegal detention by officers or private persons.[17]

Knowledge of illegality While it has been held that illegality of an attempted arrest which is unknown to accused at the time cannot reduce what otherwise might be murder to manslaughter,[18] it has also been held to be immaterial that accused did not know that the arrest was illegal.[19]

Killing of person who caused arrest The provocation caused by an illegal arrest may be adequate to mitigate the killing of the person who caused the arrest to be made, if the killing occurred in a passion due to the illegal arrest and before there had been sufficient cooling time.[20]

As provocation to others An illegal arrest or detention may be provocation, not only to the person arrested or detained, but also to his relatives or friends, or even to a stranger.[21]

§ 51. —— Trespass on, or Other Invasion of, Property Right

An offense against property is not adequate provocation so as to reduce a homicide in defending the property to manslaughter, unless there are special circumstances

An offense against property does not, in the absence of other circumstances, constitute adequate provocation so as to reduce an intentional homicide, committed in defending the property, to manslaughter,[22] although there is some authority to the contrary.[23] The rule applies where the homicide was intentionally committed with a deadly weapon, even though the trespass or larceny could have been prevented in no other way.[24]

However, a forcible attack upon or entry into one's dwelling house may, under certain conditions, be adequate provocation to the owner or other in-

Statute as to unlawful acts

(1) Under statute making slaying of one attempting to commit an unlawful act manslaughter, homicide is not reduced to manslaughter where testimony does not first show that deceased had been told by accused to keep off premises, or had not received accused's message to such effect and where testimony fails to show that lands on which shooting occurred were inclosed or within a stock-law district—Atkinson v State, 101 So 490, 137 Miss 42

(2) A person claiming wild and unoccupied land in good faith could not be guilty of a criminal trespass thereon, as regards question whether deceased was committing trespass under circumstances as would reduce crime of murder to manslaughter—Prine v State, 193 So 446, 188 Miss 147

mates,[25] even though accused had no reasonable cause to apprehend the commission of a felony by the trespasser,[26] and, if a person in lawfully opposing force to force in protecting his property is assaulted or becomes engaged in sudden combat, there may be sufficient provocation.[27]

§ 52. —— Provocation Must Be Cause of Passion

In order that a killing in passion may be reduced to manslaughter, the passion must have been caused by the provocation

Not only must there be both heat of passion and adequate provocation, as appears supra § 46, but the homicide is not reduced to manslaughter unless the provocation was the cause of the passion.[28] Hence, if the actual provocation was not known to accused at the time of the homicide it will not reduce the grade,[29] and passion arising from some provocation other than the one given when the homicide was committed will not reduce the grade.[30] However, if it is uncertain whether recent provocation actually produced passion, an antecedent provocation may indicate that it did by showing that accused's mental attitude toward deceased was such that provocation from deceased would be likely to arouse passion.[31]

Where two causes of provocation exist, the killing should be imputed to the more recent cause rather than to the earlier one.[32] This is especially so where there has been a meeting subsequent to the first cause at which the killing did not occur, although it occurred on the first meeting after the second provocation.[33]

Malice previously existing Where antecedent malice or intent to kill is established it will be presumed to continue, see supra § 27, and, unless shown to have been abandoned,[34] the killing will be attributed to it rather than to a later provocation.[35] However, where a homicide has been committed, and it appears that there was an old grudge between the persons, but at the time of the homicide there was a fresh and sudden provocation given by deceased to accused, the law presumes that the killing was caused by such fresh provocation and was not due to the old grudge.[36]

§ 53. —— By Whom Provocation Must Be Given

Provocation must have been given by the person killed, except where the wrong person was killed by accident or mistake, or the deceased was aiding and abetting the person giving the provocation.

The rule is that the provocation must have been given by the person who was killed, except in those cases in which the wrong person was killed by accident or mistake,[37] or deceased was present aiding and abetting the person causing the provocation.[38]

However, it will be only manslaughter if, while trying to kill the person from whom the provocation was received, accused killed a third person, either by accident[39] or because he mistook the third person for the one from whom the provocation was received.[40]

The killing of one other than the one accused intended to kill is considered generally supra § 44.

§ 54. —— Cooling Time

If before the killing the accused's passion had cooled, or there was sufficient time between the provocation and the killing for his passion to cool, the killing will be murder, not manslaughter.

If before the homicide was committed, accused's passion had cooled or there was sufficient time between the provocation and the killing for his passion to cool, the killing will not be attributed to the heat of passion but to malice, and will be murder,[41] even though accused's passion did not actually cool,[42] and this principle is in some jurisdictions embodied in express statutory provisions.[43] It is not necessary that the malice of accused be shown by some act of hostility committed or threatened between the provocation and the killing.[44] The exercise of thought, contrivance, and design in the mode of getting the weapon and replacing it immediately after the killing,[45] or a temporary diversion of accused's mind to some other matter, or a reasonable time between the provocation and the killing,[46] indicate design and malice, rather than a killing in sudden heat.

On the other hand, the killing need not follow immediately on the provocation,[47] and, where an interval occurs, the question whether or not it is sufficient for cooling time must be determined by the circumstances attending each particular case.[48]

The question of cooling time does not arise where there is no adequate provocation,[49] or where the entire difficulty is one single transaction,[50] or where the killing is the result of reflection or deliberation, no matter how soon it follows the provocation.[51]

Ordinary person as standard While, according to some authorities, the question whether there is sufficient cooling time should be governed by the standard of an ordinary reasonable person,[52] according to others the standard of the particular accused in the light of the facts and circumstances disclosed is to be considered.[53]

C INVOLUNTARY MANSLAUGHTER

§ 55. Definition

Involuntary manslaughter is the unintentional killing of another without malice in doing some unlawful act not amounting to a felony or tending to cause great harm, or in doing a lawful act negligently, or by negligently omitting to perform a legal duty

As described at common law and under statutes substantially declaratory thereof, involuntary manslaughter consists in the killing of another without malice and unintentionally, in doing some unlawful act not amounting to a felony or naturally tending to cause death or great bodily harm, or in doing some act lawful in itself in an unlawful manner or negligently, or by the negligent omission to perform a legal duty.[54] The unlawfulness of the act in connection with which the killing occurs is the element which distinguishes involuntary manslaughter from a killing excusable as by accident or misfortune[55] It is difficult to separate sharply an unlawful act from a lawful act done in an unlawful manner or without due caution or circumspection[56]

It is immaterial by what means or methods the offense is committed[57]

§ 56. Intent and Malice

To constitute involuntary manslaughter the homicide must have been unintentional and without malice, but even though unintentional, malice may be presumed where the accused's acts were likely to cause death, as where he used a deadly weapon.

To constitute involuntary manslaughter, the homicide must have been without intention to kill or inflict serious bodily injury,[58] and without either

Instruction that difference between voluntary manslaughter and involuntary manslaughter was that in voluntary manslaughter actor must intend to kill his victim and in involuntary manslaughter there need not be any intention to take life was erroneous, since distinction is that 'voluntary manslaughter" is done by design or intention, but without malice, and "involuntary manslaughter" is the unlawful killing of a person without malice, express or implied, but in the commission of some unlawful act—Hill v State, 11 N E 2d 141, 212 Ind 692

While the material inquiry is whether the killing was done with malice and intent to kill, and not the manner in which it was done or the deadly character of the weapon used,[60] and malice will not be presumed unless death or great bodily harm is a reasonable or probable consequence of the act,[61] nevertheless, even though the slayer did not actually intend to kill, if a deadly weapon was used in a manner likely to cause death or serious bodily harm and did so cause death, malice is implied, and the homicide will be murder rather than manslaughter,[62] and where accused's acts were such that he must have known that they were likely to cause death or serious bodily harm, so that his conduct indicated that he had a wicked, depraved, and malignant spirit, amounting to legal malice, an unintentional killing caused by such acts is murder, even though he did not use a deadly weapon.[63]

§ 57. Unlawful Acts

An unintentional killing in the commission of an unlawful act not amounting to a felony or naturally dangerous to life is involuntary manslaughter. Authorities differ as to whether the act must be one forbidden by statute or ordinance, but the act must be more than a mere thoughtless omission, and must be the proximate cause of the death.

It is involuntary manslaughter at common law and under statutes declaratory thereof where one unintentionally kills another in the commission of an unlawful act not amounting to a felony or naturally dangerous to life.[64] In determining whether a homicide was committed by a person while engaged in the commission of a misdemeanor, while he must have had an intent to commit the act which constitutes the misdemeanor, it is not necessary that he shall have intended to violate the law[65] The degree of negligence, if any, is not important as an element of involuntary manslaughter based on an unlawful act[66]

What constitutes unlawful act within rule While it has been held that the unlawful act, within this rule, connotes no particular offense known to the common law or created by statute,[67] it has also been expressly held in some jurisdictions that the unlawful act must be condemned by some statute or valid municipal ordinance of the state,[68] and in others that acts condemned by statute only, and not those condemned by an ordinance, are sufficient.[69] It has also been held that the act must be one prohibited by positive law[70] designed to prevent injury to the person[71]

The rule in some jurisdictions that involuntary manslaughter ordinarily cannot be based on an unlawful act which is merely malum prohibitum is considered infra § 60.

Sufficiency of unlawful act. It has been held that an unlawful act, to be sufficient under this rule, must be more than a mere thoughtless omission or slight deviation from the norm of prudent conduct,[72] it must be reckless or in marked disregard of the safety of others,[73] approaching the aspects of acts malum in se,[74] and the spirit of the person while committing the infraction is immaterial[75] It is immaterial whether the unlawful act was unlawful in its inception or became unlawful after the act was begun[76] The unlawful act must be such as would be reasonably anticipated by an ordinarily prudent person as likely to result in the killing[77]

Unlawful act as cause of death There must be such legal relation between the commission of the unlawful act and the homicide that it logically follows that the homicide occurred as a part of the perpetration of, or attempt to commit, the unlawful act[78] Thus the death must be due to the unlawful act of accused and not to the intervening act or negligence of a third person,[79] or to an independent intervening cause in which accused did not participate and which he could not foresee,[80] and the death must have been the natural and probable consequence of the unlawful act,[81] and the act the

§ 58. —— Assault and Battery, and Breaches of the Peace

An unintentional killing resulting from an unlawful assault and battery, not of a character of itself to cause death, is involuntary manslaughter Death unintentionally caused by an officer by violence in making an unlawful arrest, or by excessive violence in making a lawful arrest or preventing escape is within the rule

The rule that under certain circumstances an unintentional killing in the commission of an unlawful act may constitute manslaughter, considered supra § 57, has frequently been applied to death resulting from an unlawful assault and battery, not of a character of itself to cause death, wherein death unintentionally results either to the person assaulted[83] or another[84] If, however, an assault is made in self-defense, it would not be unlawful, so that the resulting death could not justify a conviction of involuntary manslaughter [85]

The rule has been applied to an unintentional homicide committed while engaged in a riot or unlawful assembly,[86] or in an affray or unlawful fighting,[87] including prize fighting, where such a fight is unlawful,[88] or in any unlawful game or sport [89] The rule also applies where death is unintentionally caused by the use of excessive force, although not such as is manifestly dangerous to life, in the correction or punishment of a child,[90] or pupil,[91] or menial [92]

Unlawful act of officer in performance of duties The rule applies to a death unintentionally caused by violence of an officer making an unlawful arrest,[93] or excessive violence in making an arrest otherwise lawful,[94] or in preventing an escape [95]

§ 59. —— Other Unlawful Acts

The rule that an unintentional killing in doing an unlawful act is involuntary manslaughter has been applied to the unlawful handling of firearms, violation of liquor laws, performance of an abortion, and other unlawful acts

The rule that the unintentional killing of another in doing an unlawful act is manslaughter, considered supra § 57, has been applied not only to unintentional killings resulting from unlawful assaults and batteries and breaches of the peace, considered supra § 58, but also to unintentional killings resulting from other unlawful acts,[96] such as the unlawful shooting, pointing, or handling of firearms,[97] the sale of liquors, poisonous and dangerous to life, for use as beverages,[98] the violation of laws prohibiting the possession or manufacture of liquors,[99] the use of an instrument or administration of a drug to produce an abortion, where such an offense is a misdemeanor only and is not committed under such circumstances as naturally to endanger life;[1] the attempt to escape from lawful custody after an arrest,[2] the attempt to prevent entrance to property for the purpose of making an arrest,[3] and the placing of an obstruction on a railroad, where there is no intent to wreck a train and the circumstances are not such that malice can be implied.[4]

§ 60. —— Acts Merely Mala Prohibita

While some authorities make no such distinction, according to others an unintentional killing occasioned by an unlawful act which was merely malum prohibitum is not manslaughter unless the death was the natural or probable result of the act, or the act was negligent.

While according to some authorities, an unintentional homicide, committed in the commission of an unlawful act which was merely malum prohibitum, is not, without more, involuntary manslaughter[5] according to other authorities, there is no longer any distinction based on acts malum in se and acts malum prohibitum,[6] and it has been held that the

Unlawful acts which are malum prohibitum do not supply the criminal intent necessary to render one punishable for a homicide unless the killing has been the natural and probable result of the act, while unlawful acts which are malum in se do supply the criminal intent—Keller v State, 299 S W 803, 155 Tenn 633, 59 A L R 685

Carrying firearms

Where killing was unintentional, accused must have pointed pistol, unlawfully carried, at deceased, or intentionally shot it so as to endanger deceased or otherwise handled it as to make the killing a natural or probable result, to make him guilty of involuntary manslaughter, since mere carrying of weapon is malum prohibitum--Holder v State, 277 S W 900, 152 Tenn 390

rule, considered supra § 57, as to an unintentional killing resulting from the commission of an unlawful act, applies even though the unlawful act was merely malum prohibitum,[7] particularly where it was in violation of a statute intended and designed to prevent injury to the person[8]

In any event, the rule applies, whether the unlawful act be malum prohibitum or malum in se, where the homicide was the natural or probable result of the unlawful act,[9] or where the act of accused was not only in violation of statute, but was also negligent and careless[10] While it has been said that the cases in which an act merely malum prohibitum has been held a sufficient basis for a charge of involuntary manslaughter have been those in which the act which is unlawful is accompanied by negligence and reckless disregard of the safety of others,[11] the need for negligence has been expressly denied[12]

Felony merely malum prohibitum While, in general, a homicide which resulted from the commission of a felony is murder, considered supra § 21, it has been held that a homicide resulting from the commission of an act which has been made a felony by statute, and was not so at common law, and which is merely malum prohibitum, will constitute manslaughter rather than murder[13]

§ 62. Negligence

a In general
b Applications of rule

a. In General

An unintentional homicide occasioned by negligence in the commission of an act lawful in itself will constitute involuntary manslaughter The negligence is generally required to be of a higher degree than is required on civil issues, and is ordinarily required to be of a gross or flagrant character, unless the unlawful act is one likely to produce death

In accordance with the description of involuntary manslaughter as including an unintentional homicide resulting from the doing of a lawful act in an unlawful or negligent manner, considered supra § 55, where an unintentional homicide is occasioned by the gross or culpable negligence of accused, although in the commission of an act lawful in itself, it is manslaughter,[14] and under some statutes to that effect, involuntary manslaughter includes a

Sale of moonshine whisky
Unlawful sale of moonshine whisky, which causes death of buyer, does not, in absence of intent to kill, make seller guilty of involuntary manslaughter unless sale is made carelessly and in such manner as manifests reckless disregard of human life, and if the whisky was dangerous for use as a beverage, was of greater potency than ordinary whisky, or contained poisonous ingredients, accused, having distilled it himself, would be charged with knowledge of its dangerous character and guilty of involuntary manslaughter —People v Pavlic, 199 N W 373, 227 Mich 562, 35 A L R 741

"Unlawful manner" as meaning negligence
It has been held that to constitute the offense of involuntary manslaughter in the commission of a lawful act in an unlawful manner the unlawfulness of the manner, way, method, or means of performance of the lawful act must amount to culpable neglect —Croker v State, 197 S E 92, 57 Ga App 895

Intent supplanted by negligence
(1) Generally, a crime has two elements, the overt act and the criminal intent, but in statutory manslaughter the element of criminal intent has been supplanted by the statutory element of culpable negligence —Pitts v State, 182 So 231, 132 Fla. 812—Hulst v State, 166 So 828, 123 Fla. 315

(2) Negligence and reckless indifference to the lives and safety of others will supply the intent for the purpose of criminal law
Hawaii —Territory v Yoshimura, 35 Hawaii 324
Iowa —State v Thomlinson, 228 N W. 80, 209 Iowa 555

(3) However, it has been held that at common law, death by negligence creates no criminal responsibility, unless law imputes criminal intent —People v Campbell, 212 N W 97, 237 Mich 424

In absence of negligence there can be no liability under this rule —Austin v State, 132 So 491, 101 Fla 990.

Elements of willfulness, or of wantonness and recklessness, which in effect are willfulness, include knowledge of situation requiring ordinary care, ability to avoid resulting harm, and omission to use such care —People v Orr, 220 N W. 777, 243 Mich. 300.

homicide in the commission of a lawful act without due caution or circumspection,[15] or a homicide in the commission of a lawful act, which might produce death, in an unlawful manner or without due care and circumspection[16]

It must be shown that a homicide was not improbable under the facts as they existed which should reasonably have influenced the conduct of accused,[17] and it has been held that it is only negligence in doing such acts as will probably endanger life or limb which constitutes that gross and culpable negligence that amounts to an unlawful act within the definition of involuntary manslaughter[18] The negligence must be that of accused personally,[19] and it must be the proximate cause of the homicide[20]

Nature and degree of negligence required While the kind of negligence required to impose criminal liability has been described in differing terms,[21] it is almost uniformly held that it must be of a higher degree than is required to establish negligence on a mere civil issue[22] However, some authorities

Under statutory definition of involuntary manslaughter, referring to "commission of a lawful act which might produce death in an unlawful manner or without due care and circumspection," the phrase "might produce death" means fraught with potentialities for producing death, such as the running of an automobile at high speed, however carefully, and handling of loaded arms, explosives, deadly germs, and the like, and under such provision the distinguishing characteristic is that the act have knowable and apparent potentialities for resulting in death—State v Lingman, 91 P 2d 457, 97 Utah 180

The degree of negligence required to render a killing occasioned thereby involuntary manslaughter has been held to vary with the potential danger involved in the lawful act being performed.[24] Thus, it is ordinarily required that the negligence on which involuntary manslaughter may be based must be of a gross or flagrant character, such as would show wantonness or recklessness, or would evince a reckless disregard of human life or the safety of others, or indifference to consequences, equivalent to criminal intent,[25] although the negligence must not be so gross as to raise the presumption of malice.[26] However, where the lawful act is a dangerous one which has notable and apparent potentialities for resulting in death, or where the statute requires that the act which was performed without due caution and circumspection must be one which might produce death, a wanton or reckless act is not required, it being sufficient that there was a failure to take those proper precautions which a person of ordinary prudence would have used under the circumstances [27]

It has been held that an intentional, willful, or wanton violation of a statute or ordinance, designed for the protection of human life or limb, which proximately results in death, is culpable negligence,[28] but it has also been held that one may violate the law without being culpably negligent in fact [29]

Negligence as unlawful act Even where involuntary manslaughter is defined as death resulting from an unlawful act, it includes death resulting from negligence where the negligence contains some element of rash or reckless conduct which approximates an unlawful act.[30]

b. Applications of Rule

The rule that a homicide occasioned by negligence may constitute manslaughter has been applied to negligence in connection with firearms, poisons, and other dangerous drugs, the operation of railroads and vessels, the acts of physicians, nurses, and the like, and in other instances

The rule that a homicide occasioned by culpable negligence may constitute manslaughter, considered supra subdivision a of this section, has been applied in a great variety of instances, as, for example, reckless or culpable negligence in riding or driving,[31] the negligent construction of a building, in consequence of which it collapses and causes death,[32] or killing another in supposed self-defense under a negligent apprehension of danger,[33] and other instances [34]

there is not gross negligence or ignorance, will not render him liable.[47] The fact that the act is with the consent of decedent does not constitute a defense.[48] Liability in such cases depends on the existence of negligence, and the fact that accused acted with the intent and the expectation that the result would be beneficial will not control,[49] although there is some authority to the effect that criminal liability will not be imposed for the consequence of the ignorance of accused when he acts with good motives and honest intentions.[50] These rules also apply to negligence on the part of nurses and attendants in hospitals or asylums and other persons occupying like positions.[51]

§ 63. Omission to Perform Duty

A homicide proximately caused by negligent omission to perform a legal duty will constitute involuntary manslaughter

A charge of manslaughter may be predicated on a failure to act as well as on an act.[52] While the willful failure of a person to perform a legal duty, whereby the death of another was caused, is murder, as considered supra § 20, if the omission was not willful, but was the result of gross or culpable negligence, it is involuntary manslaughter.[53] The omission must have been due to gross or culpable negligence,[54] and must have been the proximate cause of the death,[55] and the death must have resulted from the neglect of a plain legal duty imposed by law or contract on accused personally,[56] although it has also been held that it is not necessary that the duty be specifically imposed by statute.[57] Accused must have had knowledge of the facts imposing the duty to act or he must have been grossly negligent in not ascertaining the facts.[58]

Neglect of children or other helpless and dependent persons. The rule that it may be manslaughter to omit to perform a legal duty has frequently been applied in cases of failure on the part of parents or others charged with the custody and care of children or other helpless and dependent persons to provide shelter, food, or medical attendance and in other like cases of neglect.[59] To render accused guilty in such a case, he must have been under a legal duty imposed either by law or contract to care for deceased, and a mere moral obligation is not sufficient.[60] It is also necessary that accused have had the means or ability to furnish the shelter, food, or other necessaries.[61]

Failure to call or render medical aid The failure to render medical aid where the duty to do so exists has been held to be involuntary manslaughter if such omission is due to ordinary negligence.[62] However, where the failure of a person charged with the duty of procuring medical attendance to procure such attendance is due to a conscientious disbelief in the efficacy thereof and not from any criminal indifference to the needs of the person, it has been held that it is not criminal negligence and cannot constitute a basis for a conviction of manslaughter,[63] although such conscientious belief will not preclude conviction of involuntary manslaughter, where a statute in effect so provides, such as a statute providing that any father who has willfully neglected to maintain his wife or children, such wife or children being destitute, shall be guilty of manslaughter.[64]

Other applications of rule The rule that it is manslaughter to cause death by a grossly negligent omission to perform a legal duty has been applied

D DEGREES OF MANSLAUGHTER

§ 64. In General

Statutes dividing manslaughter into degrees vary widely, the effect of some being merely to divide common-law manslaughter into degrees

In a number of states, manslaughter, like murder, considered supra §§ 29–36, has been divided by statute into two or more degrees, according to the circumstances under which it was committed, the statutes varying widely in the different states, as fully considered infra §§ 65–67 The effect of some such statutes has been merely to divide that which was manslaughter at common law into degrees[68] Thus, under some statutes, what would be voluntary manslaughter at common law is manslaughter in the first degree, and what would be involuntary manslaughter at common law is manslaughter in the second degree[69] A statute doing away with the degrees of manslaughter has no application to offenses committed before it took effect[70]

§ 65. First Degree

What constitutes manslaughter in the first degree depends on the statutory definition.

Under a statute making manslaughter by voluntarily depriving a human being of life manslaughter in the first degree, the offense consists of the unlawful killing of another without malice either express or implied[71] The offense is committed where there was either a positive intention to kill,[72] or an act of violence from which ordinarily, in the usual course of events, death or great bodily harm might result,[73] or an act of wanton negligence[74] If the act amounting to manslaughter was voluntarily committed, the statute, without regard to the circumstances of provocation, fixes the grade of the offense and makes it manslaughter in the first degree,[75] thus, if one intentionally did an act calculated to take life, and death was unintentionally produced, the homicide is manslaughter in the first degree[76]

Use of deadly weapon

(1) Where the blow which produced death was with a deadly weapon intentionally aimed at the person slain, the homicide, if not excusable, constitutes at least manslaughter in the first degree—Smith v. State, 11 So 2d 471, 243 Ala 254—Thomas v State, Ala App, 9 So 2d 150—Lovelady v. State, 136 So 871,

Absence of design to effect death. Under some statutes to that effect, it is manslaughter in the first degree where a killing was without design to effect death and was caused by the act, procurement, or culpable negligence of another, while such other was engaged in the perpetration or attempt to perpetrate a crime not amounting to a felony in cases where such killing would have been murder at common law.[77] The crime or misdemeanor, to bring the offense within this statute, need not necessarily have been independent of and separate from the killing,[78] although the contrary view has been taken in some jurisdictions that the commission of the misdemeanor which accused was perpetrating or attempting to perpetrate must have been one which is not a part or an ingredient of the offense charged,[79] and under this view, accused must have been engaged in the commission of some offense other than violence on the person killed.[80] Where the killing was intentional, it cannot be manslaughter under this provision.[81]

Under various provisions to that effect, manslaughter in the first degree has been held to include homicide without a design to effect death, where it has been committed by a person who had been engaged in committing or attempting to commit a misdemeanor affecting the person or property either of the person killed or of another,[82] or who had been engaged in the commission of any offense,[83] or who had been bearing a deadly weapon either open or concealed,[84] or by a person in the heat of passion by means of a dangerous weapon or in a cruel or unusual manner.[85]

Statutes expressly relating to abortion. Under some statutes specifically so providing, the killing of an unborn quick child,[86] or the killing of the child or mother in an attempted abortion,[87] is, except where necessary to preserve the life of the mother, manslaughter in the first degree. To constitute a defense under such a statute, it is not necessary that the danger of death to the mother be immediate.[88]

What constitutes manslaughter in the second degree depends on the statutory definition.

Under a statute making manslaughter by voluntarily depriving a human being of life manslaughter in the first degree, and manslaughter committed under any other circumstances manslaughter in the second degree, manslaughter in the second degree, commonly called "involuntary manslaughter,"[89] is committed where there is an unlawful killing without malice or intent to kill,[90] resulting from an unlawful act,[91] or, according to the judicial decisions

What constitutes culpable negligence

(1) Culpable negligence is the omission to do something which a reasonable and prudent person would do, or the doing of something which such a person would not do under the circumstances surrounding the particular case—Wilson v State, 105 P 2d 789, 70 Okl Cr 262—Freeman v State, 101 P 2d 653, 69 Okl Cr 164—Philby v State, 76 P 2d 412, 64 Okl Cr 1—Nail v State, 242 P 270, 33 Okl Cr 100

(2) It is something more than the slight negligence necessary to support a civil action for damages.

Okl—Freeman v State, supra

(3) The test of "culpability" is whether acts charged as criminal show a degree of carelessness amounting to a culpable disregard of rights and safety of others, and whether such acts caused the death of deceased—Wilson v State, 105 P 2d 789, 70 Okl Cr 262

(4) It has also been held that culpable negligence requires conduct from which jury may reasonably infer mens rea, and that to constitute "culpable negligence" jury must find that accused intentionally did or omitted something that he should not have done or omitted and consciously realized that his conduct would in all probability produce the result actually produced—State v Bates, 271 N W 765, 65 S D 105

(5) Culpable negligence as basis of involuntary manslaughter generally see supra § 62

Negligent act constituting misdemeanor

That a negligent act, if a misdemeanor, may render one guilty of manslaughter in first degree if death resulted therefrom does not prevent it from being the basis of prosecution for manslaughter in the second degree—State v Donevan, 206 N W 927, 49 S D 192

Exercise of judgment by a contractor as to the proper method of constructing a building, which collapsed, was held not a proper basis for an indictment for manslaughter, even against the contractor who exercised the judgment—People v Gaydica, 203 N Y S 243, 122 Misc 31

Selection of contractor

Even if it is the duty of an employer to select a competent contractor to construct a building, a violation thereof is not shown by proving that the party selected has not been in business for any great length of time, and that a catastrophe has re-

the heat of passion but not by a dangerous weapon or by the use of means either cruel or unusual,[1] or where it has been unnecessarily committed while resisting an attempt by deceased to commit any felony, or to do any other unlawful act, or after such attempt has failed.[2] Under a statute so providing, a person who, by negligence or misconduct in a business in which he is engaged or in the use of any machinery or property intrusted to his care, occasioned the death of a human being, is guilty of manslaughter in the second degree.[3]

Statutes expressly relating to abortion Under some statutes it is manslaughter in the second degree to cause the death of a woman or a quick child of which she may be pregnant in an attempt to produce an unnecessary abortion.[4]

Homicide resulting from spring gun Under a statute specifically so providing, where death resulted from the placing of a spring gun, it is manslaughter in the second degree.[5]

§ 67. Third and Lesser Degrees

What constitutes manslaughter in the third and lesser degrees depends on the statutes

Under statutes to that effect, a homicide committed in the absence of justification or excuse in the heat of passion and without design to effect death, and by a dangerous weapon, is manslaughter in the third degree.[6] To come within this provision of the statutes, the killing must not have been intentional or with a design to effect death,[7] and must have been in the heat of passion.[8] Under other statutes it is manslaughter in the third degree where the homicide was involuntarily committed by the act or culpable negligence of another while engaged in committing or attempting a trespass or other injury to private rights or property.[9]

Fourth degree Under a statute so providing, it is manslaughter in the fourth degree, which is a felony,[10] where the killing was involuntary, in the heat of passion, in cases other than such as are justifiable or excusable.[11] Such a statute applies only to a killing which was unintentional,[12] and in the heat of passion,[13] and the involuntary killing must have been without a cruel or unusual weapon, and without any cruel or unusual means.[14] Under other provisions, to that effect, manslaughter in the fourth degree includes every other killing of a human being by the act, procurement, or culpable negligence of another which would be manslaughter at common law and which is not justifiable or excusable or elsewhere declared to be manslaughter in some other degree.[15] Such a provision is held to

Common law at date of statute
To constitute manslaughter, fourth degree, offense must have constituted manslaughter at common law when comprehend that which was voluntary manslaughter at common law,[16] as, for example, a killing in a sudden heat of passion aroused by adequate provocation,[17] or the unintentional killing of a person through the negligent handling of a firearm in a way indicating reckless disregard of human life[18] It also includes that which was involuntary manslaughter at common law, such as death which resulted from conduct which was made unlawful by a statute enacted for the express purpose of protecting life and limb[19]

While it has been held that culpable negligence within the meaning of this provision of the statutes does not require the existence of gross negligence in the sense of a willful intent to injure or such a reckless disregard of the rights of others or the consequences as the law deems equivalent to an intent to injure,[20] there is also authority to the contrary.[21] Moreover, under a statute making the unjustifiable killing of another resulting from gross negligence manslaughter in the fourth degree, the negligence required is gross negligence and not mere want of ordinary care.[22]

IV. ATTEMPTS, SOLICITATIONS, AND THREATS

§ 68. Attempts

a In general
b Elements of attempt

a. In General

Except as the rule is modified by statute, generally an attempt to commit murder is a misdemeanor

In accordance with the common-law doctrine with respect to attempts generally, considered in Criminal Law § 74, an attempt to commit murder is a misdemeanor at common law,[23] however, by statute in some jurisdictions, such an attempt is raised to the grade of felony[24] A general attempt statute is applicable to an attempt to commit murder,[25] unless a specific statute is controlling[26]

b. Elements of Attempt

An attempt to commit murder consists of a specific intent to kill accompanied by a sufficient overt act tending to effectuate such intent, and there must be at least an apparent ability to commit the crime.

To constitute an attempt to murder, there must be a specific intent to kill[27] and some overt act in part execution of the intent to commit the crime[28] The attempt must have been made with such intent or under such circumstances that, if consummated, the homicide would have been murder, or murder of the particular degree charged to have been attempted[29] The existence of the intent may be inferred from 21 "Reckless conduct"

To constitute manslaughter at common law when death resulted from negligent conduct in doing lawful act, conduct must have been reckless, that is, the conduct must evince disregard of consequences under circumstances involving danger to life or safety—State v Custer, 282 P 1071, 129 Kan 381, 67 A L R 909

22. In Wisconsin
( ) The rule stated in the text prevails—State v Whatley, 245 N W 95, 210 Wis 157, 99 A L R 749

(-) "Gross negligence," as used in statute requiring gross negligence in order to convict one of manslaughter in fourth degree, is not mere inadvertence in any degree, and, in order for "gross negligence" to exist, there must be present either willful intent to injure or that wanton and reckless disregard of rights of others and consequences of act to the actor as well as to others which the law deems equivalent to an intent to injure—Bussard v State, 288 N W 187, 233 Wis 11

the surrounding circumstances,[30] as from the deliberate and intentional use of a deadly weapon in the absence of circumstances negativing such intent,[31] or where one intends to kill a certain person and by mistake or inadvertence assaults or kills another person in his stead.[32]

No definite rule, applicable to all cases, can be laid down as to what constitutes an overt act tending to accomplish a murder.[33] Any act such as in the natural course of events will apparently result, if not hindered by extraneous causes, in the consummation of the murder, is sufficient.[34] Something more is required than mere menaces,[35] preparation, or planning.[36]

To constitute an attempt to murder, there must be an apparent ability to commit the intended crime,[37] and if the means used are so clearly unsuitable that it is obvious that murder cannot be committed there is no indictable attempt.[38] If there is an apparent ability to commit the murder, the attempt is indictable, although, by reason of some fact unknown to accused, the murder could not be accomplished.[39]

Distinguished from assault with intent to murder. It has been stated that there is very little substantial difference between an assault with intent to murder and an attempt to murder.[40]

§ 69. Frustrated Homicide

a. In general
b. Intent

a. In General

Under Philippine law there is a distinction between frustrated murder and attempted murder.

Under the Philippine statutes a distinction is drawn between a frustrated murder and attempted murder, the murder being regarded as frustrated where the offender performs all of the acts of execution which should precede the felony as a consequence but they nevertheless do not produce it by reason of causes independent of the will of the perpetrator,[41] while an attempt is where the offender commences the commission of the felony directly by overt acts and does not perform all of the

Presumption insufficient

Where crime requires proof of specific intent to kill, such intent, like any other fact or essential of the crime, must be proved by evidence or inferences reasonably deducible therefrom and may not be based on a presumption.—People v. Snyder, 104 P. 2d 639, 15 Cal. 2d 706, superseding, App., 96 P. 2d 986.—People v. Miller, 42 P. 2d 308, 2 Cal. 2d 527, 98 A.L.R. 913.

Intent not inferred

However, it has been held that an assault with loaded pistol must be committed with a specific intent to take life in order to elevate assault into an "attempt to commit murder," since evil intent cannot be drawn from an act, and then used to enhance the evil of the act.—Merritt v. Basis for distinction

"The distinction . . . is that in the attempt statute any attempt by overt act to do an act that would, if completed, amount to murder, regardless of the specific intent to kill a specific person, is made out by doing such act as, if consummated, would amount to murder, [whereas assault] with specific intent to kill and murder a specified person is made out only by proof sufficient to find that the specific intent to kill existed."—Norwood v. acts of execution which constitute the felony by reason of some cause or accident other than his own voluntary desistance.[42] One who unlawfully discharges a firearm at another under circumstances such that the act cannot be held to constitute a frustrated crime of parricide, murder, or homicide, or an attempt to commit any one of these crimes, may be convicted of "disparo de armas de guego" (discharge at another of a firearm).[43]

b. Intent

An intent to kill is an essential element of frustrated homicide, and the existence of such intent may be determined from the circumstances

To constitute frustrated homicide there must be an intent on the part of the assailant to take the life of the person attacked,[44] which intent may be gathered from the circumstances surrounding the attack[45] or may be disproved by such circumstances.[46]

§ 70. Solicitation

Although mere solicitation of another to commit murder is a misdemeanor, the weight of authority is that it is insufficient as an overt act to constitute an attempt to murder

According to the weight of authority merely to solicit another to commit murder is not a sufficient overt act to constitute an attempt to murder,[47] although it is indictable as a distinct crime.[48] Both at common law[49] and under statute declaratory thereof,[50] soliciting another to commit murder is a misdemeanor.

§ 71. Threats

a In general
b Against president of the United States

a. In General

By statute in some jurisdictions, a threat to kill is a crime, however, it must be made with intent to carry it out and it is insufficient if it is made merely rashly or inconsiderably.

Under the statutes in some jurisdictions, a threat to take the life of another is made a distinct and specific offense.[51] To convict one of threatening the life of another it is necessary that the threat be made with an intent to carry it out,[52] and it has been stated that a rash or inconsiderate threat is insufficient to support a conviction.[53]

b. Against President of the United States

Subject to some qualifications, it is a federal offense knowingly and willfully to threaten to take the life of the president of the United States. The threat may be oral or written and need not be made in the presence of the president or communicated to him

Under a federal statute to that effect, it is made a specific offense knowingly and willfully to threaten to take the life of, or inflict bodily harm on, the president of the United States.[54] However, the statute includes only threats against the president in his public character and capacity.[55] It is not necessary that the threat be made in the presence of the president or communicated to him,[56] or that it should have been of such nature or extent as, in any degree, to disturb or unsettle his mind or deprive him of his free and voluntary action,[57] nor need the threat be communicated as a command to anyone obliged to act on it.[58] An oral,[59] as well as a written,[60] threat is within the meaning of the statute, and it need not be addressed or spoken to any person, if spoken in the hearing of any person or persons.[61]

A threat is knowingly made if the maker of it comprehends the meaning of the words uttered by him.[62] It is willfully made if, in addition to comprehending the meaning of his words, the maker voluntarily and intentionally utters them as the declaration of an apparent determination to carry them into execution.[63] When the unlawful threat is knowingly and willfully made, the offense is complete[64] so that the existence of an intention to carry out the threat[65] or a subsequent abandonment of the bad intent with which the threat is made[66] is immaterial. Although idle talk or jesting will not constitute the crime,[67] accused cannot be regarded as having used his language only as a joke because of the fact that he may have had no intention to carry out his threat.[68]

The motive which prompts the utterance of the threat is immaterial.[69] To bring a case within the statute no evil purpose or malice is requisite other than an intention to give utterance to words which to accused's knowledge were in the form of, and would naturally be understood by the hearers as being, a threat.[70] A threat is not deprived of its quality as a threat by the fact that it is conditioned on a contingency which is possible.[71]

V. ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO MURDER OR KILL

§ 72. Assault with Intent to Murder

Particular matters and elements of an assault with intent to murder are discussed in detail in the sections immediately following.

Examine Pocket Parts for later cases.

§ 73. —— Definition and Nature of Offense

An assault with intent to murder is an unlawful attempt, committed willfully and maliciously, with intent to take the life of the party assaulted. It is a misdemeanor at common law, but by statutes in many jurisdictions it has been made a felony.

It has been stated that the elements constituting an assault with intent to murder, as discussed infra §§ 74–84, are an intentional attempt by violence with present or apparent ability, with malice and without legal excuse or provocation, to do an injury to the person of another, accompanied by facts and circumstances indicative of an intent to take life.[72] The crime of assault with intent to murder has been defined as an assault committed unlawfully, willfully, and maliciously, and with intent to take the life of the person assaulted.[73] While the elements of an assault may be involved in an attempt to commit murder, there is no such offense as an attempt to commit an assault with intent to murder [74]

(1) "'Willful' means that the accused must have been governed by his will as contra-distinguished from

Distinguished from assault with intent to kill. There is a well recognized distinction between an assault with intent to murder and an assault with intent to kill [75] Malice is a necessary element to constitute an assault with intent to murder but it is absent in an assault with intent to kill or commit manslaughter,[76] or, as it is said, the assault with intent to kill may be committed without malice [77] If malice is lacking and yet the assault is unlawful, the crime committed is of a lower degree than assault with intent to murder [78]

Grade of offense At common law, an assault with intent to commit murder is not a felony but is regarded as a serious or aggravated misdemeanor,[79] although anciently it appears to have been a felony [80] It has been held that the presence of the element of intent to kill raises the crime to the dignity of a felony [81] In many jurisdictions, it has been made a felony by statute,[82] although, under some statutory provisions, it remains a misdemeanor [83] Statutes changing the grade of the offense from that of a misdemeanor to that of a felony, however, do not change the common-law elements thereof [84]

§ 74. —— Attempt or Overt Act

An overt act in pursuance of an intent to murder is an essential element of an assault with intent to murder, and mere intent, preparation, or threat is insufficient

In addition to the requisite intent, as considered infra § 79, in order to constitute an assault with intent to murder, there must be an attempt[85] or an assault to carry out that intention [86] In other words, there must be an overt act in pursuance of the intent as distinguished from the mere intent itself,[87] and also from mere threats,[88] or mere preparations not going far enough to constitute an attempt [89] There must be a commencement of an act which, if not prevented, would produce a battery [90] On the other hand, there may be an assault where a dangerous weapon is presented in a threatening manner accompanied by a conditional threat,[91] unless in a case where the threat is conditioned on a demand which accused had a right to make [92] An overt act in execution of the requisite intent completes the offense [93] An assault may

§ 75. —— Means Employed

Generally, except where required by statute, the use of a deadly or dangerous weapon is not an essential element of an assault with intent to murder The use of poison with an intent of causing the death of the victim may constitute the offense.

By the weight of authority it is not essential to an assault with intent to commit murder that a deadly or dangerous weapon shall have been employed,[98] unless the statute so requires,[99] nor need any weapon at all have been used[1] Thus trying to choke[2] or suffocate and drown[3] another, or the sending of a box containing explosives, which explodes when opened,[4] has been held to constitute an assault with intent to murder Also abandoning a newborn child to the elements,[5] or throwing a deformed and helpless person to the ground and leaving him there exposed to the inclemency of the weather,[6] may constitute the offense.

Poison Where poison is the agent employed with the intention of causing the death of another, the placing of it within reach of an intended victim does not complete the offense unless the poison is actually taken[7] Where, however, the poison is actually taken, it is not necessary that accused shall have manually administered it to the victim[8] Where poison is actually administered it has been held that it must be shown that it endangered life,[9] but, where it is shown that a dangerous poison was actually administered with the intent to take life, the offense is complete[10]

Possibility of causing death

If it is possible that death might have been inflicted by the weapon used in committing an assault, and if accused intended thereby to take life by the use made thereof, the offense of "assault with intent to murder" was complete, notwithstanding the instrument used was not a deadly weapon—Ammann v State, Tex Cr, 165 S W 2d 744—Bailey v State, 58 S W 2d 834 123 Tex Cr 206—Rose v State, 58 S W 2d 526, 123 Tex Cr 261—Basquez v State, 26 S W 2d 206, 114 Tex Cr 602

In Texas under the statute it was held that maliciously administering poison was not an assault with intent to murder, or an assault of any kind—Garnet v State, 1 Tex App. 605, 28 Am R. 425.

§ 76. —— Present Ability to Kill

Present ability to carry out the intent is an essential element of an assault with intent to murder, and under some authorities an apparent present ability is sufficient.

In order that there may be guilt of assault with intent to murder, the intent alone is not sufficient,[11] in the absence of either real or apparent ability to accomplish it[12] According to some authorities, accused must have had at the time of the act a present ability to carry out the intent[13]

The mere fact that an accused does not have the ability to kill does not necessarily show a lack of intent to murder[14] So that one may be guilty of assault with intent to murder, if he has such intent at the time, although the means selected and used in its attempted execution would not ordinarily accomplish the result intended, if accused is ignorant of such fact and thinks he is in fact employing means capable of executing the design[15] If, on the other hand, accused at the time has knowledge that the means which he employs are incapable of killing, it shows the absence of the requisite intent[16] Where an assault is made with a firearm within its carrying distance, the guilt of accused cannot be made to depend on whether the weapon was in fact capable of killing at the distance[17] All that is necessary in such a case is that the means are apparently adapted to the end[18]

Under a statute defining assault and making present ability to inflict injury an element thereof, it has been held that, in order that there may be guilt of assault with intent to murder, accused must at the time have had the ability to execute the intent[19] Under such a statute, it cannot be said that the ability to do the act threatened was wanting because the act was in some manner prevented,[20] nor, where accused was advancing with a weapon to strike, need he have come within striking distance[21]

§ 77. —— Extent of Injury

An actual striking or wounding of the person assaulted is not necessary to constitute an assault with intent to murder

The manner of an assault should not be confounded with its results[22] The extent of the injury received by the person assaulted does not necessarily determine accused's guilt of assault with intent to murder[23] Indeed it is not necessary that any bodily injury should have resulted where all the elements of murder were present had death ensued[24] Thus, where the intent to commit murder exists, to shoot at a man and miss him completes the offense[25]

§ 78. —— Malice

Generally, malice or malice aforethought is an essential element of an assault with intent to murder and may be express or implied Malice may be inferred from the surrounding circumstances, such as, among other facts, the use of a deadly weapon or the reckless disregard for human life

Malice or malice aforethought is an essential ingredient of assault with intent to murder[26] As in the case of murder, considered supra § 16, malice may be either express or implied [27] It includes not only anger, hatred, and revenge, but every unlawful and unjustifiable motive [28] It is not confined to ill will toward an individual, but is intended to denote an action flowing from any wicked and corrupt motive,[29] done with a wicked mind under such circumstances as evince a plain indication of a heart reckless of social duty and fatally bent on mischief [30] It is implied from any deliberate or cruel act against another which shows an abandoned and malignant heart [31] It is the opposite of an act performed under uncontrollable action which prevents all deliberation or cool reflection in forming a purpose [32]

While the expression "malice aforethought" includes the element of premeditation,[33] it is immaterial for how short a time the malice may have existed [34]

Deliberation is regarded as an essential element of assault with intent to commit murder under some statutes,[35] while under other statutes, malice is sufficient without deliberation[36] or premeditation,[37] or premeditated design [38] Under statutes dividing murder into degrees, discussed supra § 29, and making premeditation an element of murder in the first degree, considered supra § 33, in order to constitute an assault with intent to commit murder in the first degree, the element of premeditation must be present,[39] but, under such statutes in order that there may be a conviction of assault with intent to murder, deliberation and premeditation are not essential [40] Where premeditated design is made an element of murder in the first degree, an assault with intent to kill without premeditated design may

It is not essential that premeditation and deliberation should exist, for, if the assault was made with specific intent to kill and the circumstances are such that, if death had resulted it would have constituted murder, either in the first or second degree, the offense is assault with intent to murder —Cheeks v State, 278 S W 10, 169 Ark. 1192.

Inference and presumption of malice. The existence of malice as an element of assault with intent to murder may be inferred or presumed from the surrounding circumstances,[42] such as the use of a deadly weapon,[43] the character of the assault,[44] the unexplained attempt to take life,[45] or where the assault is unlawful and is done without reasonable provocation or circumstance of palliation,[46] or is committed deliberately and is likely to result fatally,[47] or from the reckless disregard of human life [48]

a. In General

There must be a specific intent to kill in order to have an assault with intent to murder and the intent need not exist for any appreciable length of time.

A specific intent to take human life is an essential element of the offense of assault with intent to commit murder,[49] and, as otherwise stated, where an unjustifiable assault is made by one capable of cool reflection and not in the heat of passion, with

Test to ascertain intent

In ascertaining the intent alleged in an indictment alleging "assault with intent to commit murder," test to be applied is whether, if a homicide had occurred under the same circumstances, it would justify a conviction of murder —People v Downen, 28 N E 2d 91, 374 Ill 146

Meaning of "intent to kill"

(1) "Intent to kill" in making of an assault does not necessarily mean that accused had a premeditated design and fixed purpose to effect death, even for a short time before making the assault, but means that he willfully and unlawfully makes an assault with a deadly weapon which he knows, or should reasonably be expected to result in death of person assaulted —Phillips v State, 162 So 346, 120 Fla 134

(2) An intent to kill may be tantamount to an intent to commit murder —Commonwealth v Berardino, 153 A 687, 302 Pa 403, affirming 100 Pa Super 58

An accident does not constitute an assault with intent to murder —Buchanan v State, 74 S W 2d 1022, 127 Tex Cr 100

Necessity of intent to assault

(1) Conviction of assault with intent to murder is unauthorized, where there was no evidence tending to show specific intent to kill or intentional assault - Springer v State, 139 S E 159, 37 Ga App 154

(2) The crime of assault with intent to commit murder requires the presence of both the intent to commit a violent injury, which is a necessary part of the assault, and the specific intent to kill —People v Alexander, 106 P 2d 450, 41 Cal App 2d 275, rehearing denied 106 P 2d 916, 41 Cal App 2d 275.

the intention of killing, it will constitute an assault with intent to murder where death does not result.[50] Of course, the mere fact that death does not result does not show an absence of an intent to kill.[51] The requisite intent may be formed on the instant of the assault[52]

A conviction will not be supported under circumstances showing no intent to kill,[53] as where the evidence shows but an intent to kill based on a conditional threat[54] or nothing more than an intent to maim[55] or to inflict serious bodily harm,[56] and it has been said that murder in the first degree may be committed in an attempt to perpetrate arson, rape, robbery, or burglary, and yet an assault committed in such an attempt is not an assault with intent to murder[57] Although there may be an intent to commit one crime, there may be an alternative or concurrent intent to take life[58]

Abandonment of intent If the specific intent existed and was accompanied by some assault, the conviction may be sustained, although there was a subsequent abandonment of the intent[59]

b. Inference of Intent

(1) In general
(2) Deadly weapon

(1) In General

The specific intent to kill required in an assault with intent to murder may be inferred from the surrounding circumstances, and various matters have been considered as bearing on the propriety of an inference of such intent.

While a specific intent to kill is an essential ingredient of the offense of assault with intent to commit murder, as stated supra subdivision a of this section, this requirement does not exact an intent, other than an intent which is inferable from the circumstances[60] The law presumes that one intended the natural and probable consequences of his act and the requisite intent to kill may be inferred from such acts[61] It may be inferred or presumed as a fact from the surrounding circumstances,[62] such as the acts and conduct of accused,[63] the nature of the instrument used in making the as-

(2) Deadly Weapon

An inference of the requisite intent, in an assault with intent to murder, generally may be made from the unlawful use of a deadly weapon, provided it was used in a way to indicate an intention to kill. The weapon may be deadly per se or its deadly character may be determined from the manner of its use

The requisite intent in an assault with intent to murder may be inferred or presumed from the unlawful use of a deadly weapon,[74] provided it was used in such a manner as to indicate an intention to kill.[75] Even where the weapon used is not deadly, the intent to kill may be established by other facts.[76]

Leveling of gun

However intent to murder may not be inferred from mere leveling of gun, and the fact that accused did not shoot, there being nothing to prevent him, tends to negative existence of such intent.—Toler v. State, 108 So. 443, 143 Miss. 96.

Wounding

Law imputes a malicious intent to the act of wounding another with a deadly weapon.—Drinkard v. Commonwealth, 183 S.E. 251, 165 Va. 799.—Gillis v. Commonwealth, 126 S.E. 51, 141 Va. 445.—Johnson v. Commonwealth, 115 S.E. 673, 135 Va. 524, 30 A.L.R. 755.

Not presumption of law

Intent to kill is not presumed as a matter of law from the use of a deadly weapon in making the assault.

Conclusiveness of inference

(1) "If a deadly weapon is used in a deadly manner the inference is almost conclusive that the intent was to kill."—Scroggins v. State, 45 S.W.2d 983, 984, 119 Tex.Cr. 32.—Hawkins v. State, 29 S.W.2d 384, 385, 115 Tex.Cr. 163.

(2) Intent to kill is not conclusively shown by the use of a weapon likely to produce death.—Griffin v. State, 177 S.E. 511, 50 Ga.App. 213.

Absence of intent

Use of a deadly weapon without a homicidal intent will not sustain a charge of assault with intent to commit homicide in any degree.—Fortner v. State, 161 So. 94, 119 Fla. 150.

Physical circumstances

To shoot at another with a gun did not necessarily constitute "assault with intent to murder," to constitute such offenses the shot must be fired under such circumstances as are reasonably calculated to produce the result intended, and hence if the intended victim be at such a distance as to be out of range of the gun, the intent to kill may be lacking.—Burks v. State, Tex.Cr., 165 S.W.2d 460.

76. Tex.—Scroggins v. State, 45 S.W.2d 983, 119 Tex.Cr. 32.—Hawkins v. State, 29 S.W.2d 384, 115 Tex.Cr. 163.

with which death may be easily and readily produced,[77] or otherwise described as one which, from the manner used, is calculated or likely to produce death or serious bodily injury[78]

A weapon capable of producing death is not necessarily deadly or dangerous[79] In case a weapon is not deadly per se, the manner of its use will determine whether it is deadly or dangerous[80] So a piece of lumber,[81] a pocketknife,[82] a pistol,[83] a sawed-off billiard cue,[84] or a stone[85] may, from the manner of its use, constitute a deadly weapon

On the other hand, the following have been held not necessarily deadly weapons An axe,[86] a knife,[87] a piano stool,[88] and a screwdriver[89]

A dirk knife[90] a gun,[91] a pistol,[92] or shotgun[93] ordinarily is regarded as a deadly weapon per se

The lethal character of the weapon used in making an assault may be inferred from its size,[94] the effect produced,[95] the seriousness of the wounds inflicted thereby,[96] or other circumstances tending to show its deadly character[97] However, a mere desire to kill does show that the weapon used was deadly.[98]

Where the weapon used was not shown to be of a deadly character and there was nothing in the manner of its use to indicate an intention to take life, a conviction of assault with intent to murder cannot be sustained[99]

§ 80. —— Murder Had Death Ensued

To constitute an assault with intent to murder, the act must have been done under such circumstances that, if death resulted, the homicide would have been murder, and according to the weight of authority it is immaterial whether it would have been murder in the first or second degree

In order that an act may constitute an assault with intent to commit murder, it must have been committed under such circumstances that, had it resulted in death, the homicide would have been murder[1] However, the converse is not true and the fact that, if death had resulted, it would have been

Felonious homicide

Under a statute defining certain assaults with intent to kill, it is not necessary to prove the elements of murder, but the charge is sustained if accused would have been guilty of any grade of felonious homicide had death ensued —Moore v State, 218 P 1106, 25 Okl Cr 54

Distinguished from murder

(1) The only difference between crime of 'murder' and "assault with intent to murder" is that in the former the state must prove that death ensued within a year and a day from date injury was inflicted, and in the latter death does not ensue within that period of time —Head v State, Ga App, 24 S E 2d 145

(2) Assault with intent to murder contains all the elements of murder except the actual death —State v Jones, 130 S E 747, 133 S C 167

murder is not conclusive that the assault was committed with the requisite intent to kill,[2] since, as discussed supra §§ 20–21, under some circumstances an unintentional killing may constitute murder Accordingly, if the evidence should show that, had homicide resulted, the offense would have been manslaughter only, then accused cannot be convicted of an assault with intent to murder [3]

Although the crime of murder has been divided into degrees by statute, as considered supra §§ 29–36, it is ordinarily immaterial whether the homicide, had it resulted, would have been murder in the first or second degree [4] However, to constitute an assault with intent to commit murder in the first degree, as defined by some statutes, it is essential that the homicide, had it occurred, would have been murder in the first degree,[5] and it is so held where only the first degree of murder requires an intent to kill.[6] Under a statute making the absence of a design to effect death an element of murder in the third degree, there can be no such offense as assault with intent to commit murder in the third degree [7]

§ 81. —— Intent to Kill One Other than Person Injured

The authorities are divided as to whether an accused may be convicted of an assault with intent to murder the person injured, where he intended to murder one person and inflicted injury on another not intended

According to one line of authorities, if the intent was to murder a person other than the person injured, accused cannot be convicted of assault with intent to murder the latter, proof of a general felonious intent not being sufficient to sustain the indictment,[8] so, if accused aims at one person but wounds another, he cannot be convicted of assault with intent to murder the person wounded [9] On the other hand, it is held in other jurisdictions that, where a man deliberately shoots at one person but misses him and wounds another, he may be convicted of assault with intent to murder the person injured [10] Some of these decisions are based on the theory that conduct which is so reckless as to imply total disregard for the lives of others raises an implication or presumption of general malice,[11] others are based on the theory that the proximity of the injured person to the person aimed at causes his injury to be necessarily apprehended as a probable consequence of the act,[12] others are based on the theory that the malicious intent is transferred to the person injured,[13] and still others on the language of statutes which do not in terms confine the intent to kill to the person assaulted [14]

Mistaken identity An accused, who assaulted another with intent to murder, under a mistaken belief that the person assaulted was a third person on whom the assault was intended, is guilty of assault with intent to murder the actual victim [15]

§ 82. —— Indiscriminate Assault on Several

Shooting into a crowd indiscriminately, with intent to kill some one, is an assault with intent to kill each of them.

Where a person fires into a crowd indiscriminately with intent to kill some one, it is an assault with intent to kill each of them [16]

§ 83. —— Setting Spring Gun or Man Trap

Setting of a spring gun is not an assault with intent to murder in the absence of a specific intent to kill the person actually injured.

The setting of spring guns or other deadly machines as a nuisance, if the public is thereby subjected to danger, is discussed in the C J S title Nuisances § 71, also 46 C J p 724 notes 7–10, but it has been held that it is not punishable as assault with intent to murder where there was no specific intent to kill the person actually injured [17]

§ 84. —— Resisting Officer

Subject to some qualifications, the rule generally is that, one who resists and attempts to kill an officer lawfully executing his functions, such as arrest, may be guilty of an assault with intent to murder, but, where the officer is acting unlawfully, one may use reasonable force to resist his arrest

One who resists and attempts to kill an officer lawfully in the act of arresting him may be convicted of assault with intent to murder,[18] and the same rule applies in the case of the resistance of other lawful acts of an officer [19] Where a person is told by an officer that he is an officer and has a warrant for his arrest, or where the person has knowledge of such fact independently of any information given by the officer, it is his duty to submit to arrest,[20] but, where the person attempting to make the arrest conducts himself so as to put the prisoner's life in danger, the latter may repel force with force [21] When the aggression of an officer in making an arrest exceeds what is reasonably necessary to effect the arrest, the right of self-defense inures to the party assaulted [22] The fact that one engaged in a personal encounter is a peace officer gives him no greater rights than any other citizen, when he is not endeavoring to effect the arrest of a person assaulted by him [23]

No one is obliged to submit to an illegal arrest, and the fact that the person assaulted had no lawful authority to make the arrest will mitigate the offense or may even excuse the assault,[24] however, resistance in such cases must not be in enormous disproportion to the wrong and injury threatened [25] Accused's right to resist his illegal arrest is not dependent on the arresting officer's good or bad faith,[26] or on whether the officer was acting in his official capacity,[27] or on whether accused knew that he was an officer [28]

fering death or grievous bodily harm or he had no reasonable belief of such danger, his conviction of assault with intent to murder will be sustained, although the attempted arrest was illegal [29] Also, it has been held that, where there is no reasonable cause to apprehend any worse treatment than a legal arrest should subject a person to, it is the duty of a person to submit to an illegal arrest and seek his redress from the law [30] Even an unwarranted attempt by a private person to make an arrest will not justify resistance to the point of an assault with intent to murder [31]

Although an officer is never justified in shooting one guilty of a misdemeanor to effectuate his arrest or prevent his escape, as considered in Arrest § 13 c, in order to justify shooting in self-defense while attempting an arrest, the officer must be in imminent danger of great personal injury, or the shooting must be done to prevent the commission of a felony [32]

§ 85. Assault with Intent to Kill or Commit Manslaughter

a In general
b Elements of offense

a. In General

Although there is no such offense at common law, an assault with intent to kill or commit manslaughter is a statutory crime and, depending on the statute, is punishable as a felony or a misdemeanor.

At common law there is no such offense as assault with intent merely to kill or commit manslaughter [33] Assaults with intent to kill or with intent to commit manslaughter are frequently punishable as such under particular statutes [34] There is no such offense as an assault with intent to commit involuntary manslaughter [35] Dependent on statute, an assault with intent to kill or commit manslaughter may be a felony [36] or a misdemeanor [37]

Although similar, an attempt to commit manslaughter and an assault with intent to commit manslaughter are distinct offenses [38]

The distinction between an assault with intent to kill or commit manslaughter and an assault with intent to commit murder is considered supra § 73

b. Elements of Offense

Except as otherwise provided by statute, an assault with intent to kill or commit manslaughter consists of an intent to kill and an overt act toward its commission, under circumstances which would have made the act manslaughter if death had ensued

To constitute the statutory offense of assault with intent to kill or to commit manslaughter, the assault must have been made under circumstances which would have made the act manslaughter if death had ensued [39] It is necessary [40] and sufficient [41] that the crime would have been voluntary manslaughter had death ensued from the assault; but if the crime would have been involuntary manslaughter had death ensued, it is insufficient[42] The gist of the offense is the intent to kill[43]

Overt act To constitute an assault with intent to kill or commit manslaughter, it is necessary that there be an attempt or offer by force or violence to carry out that intention[44]

Means employed It is not essential to an assault with intent to commit manslaughter that a deadly or dangerous weapon shall have been used,[45] unless under a statute so providing, it is required that, in addition to the intent to commit manslaughter on the person of the party assailed, the assault must have been made with a deadly weapon[46]

Extent of injury Under a statute to such effect, the infliction of serious injury not resulting in death is an essential element of the offense[47]

Necessity of striking Where a statute punishes shooting or wounding another with intent to kill, an actual striking is required,[48] and it has been held that a person is not "shot" when he is only powder burned by the weapon discharged[49]

Intent to kill one other than the person injured According to some authorities, if the intent was to kill a person other than the person injured, accused cannot be convicted of assault with intent to kill the person injured,[50] but there is other authority holding a contrary view.[51]

§ 86. Defenses

In addition to defenses usually available in the prosecution of any crime, matters which negative an essential element of an assault with intent to murder or kill constitute a defense thereto

Generally, matters which bar a prosecution for the offense, as discussed in Criminal Law §§ 38-54, or matters which negative the essential elements of the crime, to be discussed in detail in the following sections, are a defense to a prosecution for assault with intent to murder or kill[52] As noted supra §§ 79, 80, and infra § 87, a conviction of an assault with intent to murder cannot be supported where the circumstances are such that the killing, had it taken place, would not have been murder, nor, as appears infra §§ 88-95, can accused be convicted of an assault with intent to commit murder or manslaughter, where the killing, had it taken place, would have constituted justifiable or excusable homicide

Where the intent is directed toward one person and another person is injured by accident, accused is entitled to any defense, mitigation, or extenuation which might have been offered had he injured the person intended[53]

In addition to the specific defenses to the charge of assault with intent to murder or kill, discussed in the succeeding sections, various other matters have been held to constitute[54] or not to constitute[55] justification, excuse, extenuation or mitigation of such assault.

§ 87. —— Passion and Provocation

Subject to some qualifications, the rule is that one cannot be guilty of an assault with intent to murder if the assault was the result of a sudden passion caused by an adequate provocation

Since malice is an essential element of assault with intent to commit murder, considered supra § 78, and since, as considered supra § 42, the technical malice essential to murder is lacking where a homicide is committed on a sudden heat of passion caused by adequate provocation, one cannot be guilty of assault with intent to murder if the assault was the result of a sudden passion occasioned by an adequate provocation,[56] but the provocation must have been adequate[57] It must be sufficient to stir the resentment of a reasonable man,[58] or, according to some authorities, to give rise to an irresistible passion[59]

Provocation alone is not sufficient[60] The exercise of a legal right, no matter how offensive, will not be deemed provocation for an assault[61] Mere words, no matter how vulgar or obscene[62] or abusive,[63] will not constitute adequate provocation. Further, accused must not himself have provoked or brought on the difficulty[64] Passion will not constitute a defense where there has been adequate cooling time,[65] and what constitutes adequate cooling time depends on the nature of the man and his mind as well as the circumstances and nature of the provocative act[66]

§ 88. —— Insanity and Intoxication

Usually, insanity or intoxication causing a mental incapacity to entertain the necessary intent to kill may constitute a valid defense to the charge of assault with intent to murder or commit manslaughter, even though the incapacity resulted from voluntary intoxication, although there is some authority to the contrary.

Subject to the rules hereinbefore stated, see supra § 4, insanity may constitute a defense to a charge of assault with intent to commit murder[67] or voluntary manslaughter[68]

There is authority holding that voluntary drunkenness or partial drunkenness is no defense to the charge of assault with intent to murder or kill,[69] but in most jurisdictions, voluntary intoxication may reduce what would otherwise be an assault with intent to murder or kill to an offense of lesser degree, by showing that accused did not have the specific intent which is a necessary element in the crime,[70] unless the rule is changed by statute.[71] However, the latter rule does not apply where accused was not so drunk as to be incapable of entertaining the necessary specific intent.[72]

Drunkenness, although not so excessive as to render accused utterly incapable of forming a deliberate purpose, may have produced a state of mind unfavorable to premeditation, and this should be taken into consideration by the jury.[73] On the other hand, it has been held that drunkenness which does not amount to insanity is no defense, so as to entitle accused to an entire acquittal.[74]

§ 89. —— Self-Defense in General

Generally, self-defense obtains in cases of assault with intent to murder or kill if there is a reasonable apprehension of immediate danger of death or great bodily harm, and in a proper case a person acting in self-defense, may use such force as is reasonably necessary to protect himself from such danger

The law of self-defense in cases of homicide applies also in cases of assault with intent to murder or assault with intent to commit manslaughter,[75] so that if the homicide would have been excusable had death ensued the unsuccessful attempt to kill is also excusable.[76] If accused with good reason believed that the person assaulted was about to take his life or to do him great bodily harm, accused had a right to act in self-defense.[77] In order to invoke the doctrine of self-defense, no hard and fast rule can be laid down as to just what conduct on the part of the victim is sufficient to induce a reasonable belief in accused that he is about to lose his life or suffer great bodily harm.[78] Each case must be considered in the light of the proved facts and circumstances.[79]

If accused had a reasonable apprehension, under the circumstances, that he was in immediate danger of death or great bodily harm, even though in fact no such danger existed, it is sufficient to justify his act in self-defense,[80] although in at least one jurisdiction, accused's right of self-defense obtains against any character of unlawful attack and is not limited to attacks which put him in fear of death or serious bodily injury.[81] He must have entertained an honest belief that he was in such danger,[82] his act must have been necessary or honestly believed by him to be necessary to prevent the injury,[83] and

"An accused is justified in using the circumstances must have been such as to excite the fear of a reasonable man [84]

Necessity of overt act toward accused Mere threats, however violent, will not ordinarily justify an assault of a deadly nature [85] The person assaulted must in some manner have manifested his immediate intention of executing the threats,[86] or, as otherwise stated, at the time of the assault there must have been some overt act toward accused indicative of imminent danger [87] There is no exact general definition of an overt act justifying a person in the exercise of the right of self-defense which can be applicable to every case [88] The bare fear that a man intends to kill or commit some serious personal injury, however well grounded, unaccompanied by any overt act indicative of such intention, will not warrant killing or attempting to kill the party by way of prevention [89]

Amount of force in repelling attack Accused has a right to use such force as reasonably appears to him to be necessary to save his life or to protect himself from great bodily harm [90] However, he is not justified in using more force than is apparently necessary to avert the danger [91] He is required to exercise only reasonable judgment in determining the amount of requisite force [92]

Under circumstances which would justify it, accused may use a deadly weapon in self-defense.[93] If the assault is not felonious and there is no reason for a belief on the part of the person assaulted that the danger is actual and imminent, he is not justified in using a deadly weapon in a deadly manner [94] One on whom another was making a mere assault with the fist without intending to do great bodily harm, and who was not deceived as to the character of the assault was not justified in taking life or in using a deadly weapon in self-defense,[95] but if accused acted under the smart of an unexpected assault, he cannot be convicted of assault with intent to murder, although he may be convicted of simple assault, or at most aggravated assault [96]

Accidental injury to another Accused may assert that the shooting was in self-defense where in defending himself against a third person he accidentally shot another [97]

Attack by several Where one is attacked by several assailants, he is justified in acting on the hostile demonstrations of any one of them [98]

§ 90. —— Duty to Retreat

Except as modified by statute, the general rule, subject to some qualifications, is that it is necessary to retreat before one may resort to deadly measures in his defense

In order to justify his act on the ground of self-defense accused must as a rule have employed all means within his power and consistent with his safety to avoid the danger and avert the necessity for taking life [99] Therefore, it is as a general rule the duty of a person assaulted to retreat before resorting to deadly measures in his defense, unless retreat would increase his peril, or he has a reasonable apprehension that it would do so,[1] and he must retreat in good faith and not for the purpose of executing a fixed design to kill,[2] but a person assaulted in a place where he has a right to be may stand his ground and repel force with force even to the taking of his assailant's life, if necessary, in order to preserve his own or protect himself from great bodily harm [3] In some jurisdictions the common-law rule has been changed by statute so that a person who is unlawfully attacked is not bound to retreat, but may stand his ground, regardless of the character of the attack [4]

§ 91. —— Where Accused Is Aggressor

Ordinarily, one who provokes a difficulty is not entitled to the excuse of self-defense unless he first, in good faith, withdraws from the conflict

One who provokes a combat by assaulting another cannot as a rule avail himself of the excuse of self-defense,[5] unless he first, in good faith, withdraws from the contest which he has brought on [6] One who seeks another for the purpose of provoking a difficulty is not deprived of the right of self-defense, where he does nothing to provoke a difficulty when he meets him,[7] but on the other hand, one may be guilty of having provoked the difficulty, precluding him from invoking the doctrine of self-defense, although he did not intend to provoke any difficulty when he approached the prosecutor [8] If accused acted without felonious intent, the mere fact that he brought on the difficulty does not necessarily preclude him from justifying on the ground of self-defense where he was afterward compelled to act in self-defense [9]

Mere inequality in size and strength will not authorize the smaller combatant to resent a blow by stabbing his assailant —Morgan v State, 16 S E 836, 119 Ga 566

Mere words, however, no matter how vile, will not constitute adequate provocation as to preclude the person speaking them from setting up self-defense [10] On the other hand, there is authority recognizing the rule that one who uses opprobrious language toward another which is calculated to and does bring on difficulty will be deprived of the right of self-defense.[11]

§ 92. —— Mutual Combat

One who voluntarily engages in a conflict cannot ordinarily assert self-defense as an excuse.

Where a fight is engaged in by mutual agreement, the law of self-defense cannot be invoked [12] So that, if accused invites the prosecuting witness to engage in a fight, self-defense cannot be set up in a prosecution for assault with intent to kill [13] A person who enters a combat armed with a concealed deadly weapon may use it to protect his life, if his adversary who struck the first blow resorts to such a weapon, and will not be guilty of assault with intent to murder, unless he intended from the first to use the weapon if necessary to overcome his antagonist [14]

§ 93. —— Defense of Property

One may use such reasonable force as is necessary to protect or regain possession of his property, and in a proper case an assault with intent to kill may be justified. A mere trespass will not, however, justify such assault

An assault with intent to kill cannot be justified on the ground that it was necessary to prevent a mere trespass on property or to expel an actual trespasser,[15] but a person may lawfully repel force by force in defense of his property against one who manifestly intends, by violence or surprise, to commit a felony against it, and, if in making such defense, he takes or endangers the life of the felonious aggressor, the act is justifiable [16] Under a statute regarding resistance of an attempt to take property by "force," an attempted taking need not be by violence to justify forcible resistance [17]

The owner may lawfully use such reasonable force as is necessary, under the circumstances, to protect or regain possession of his property,[18] and what is such reasonable force is a question of fact for the jury [19] The criterion of necessity which justifies the use of force by the property owner in defense of his property is the apparent, and not the actual, necessity,[20] and he will be judged by what a reasonably prudent man in good faith would do under such circumstances [21]

The use of a deadly weapon may sometimes be justified,[22] as where both the person and the property of the owner are in danger,[23] and is a factor to be considered in determining whether excessive force was used [24] The right of the proprietor of a store to eject therefrom a turbulent and profane intruder inheres also in his clerks [25] The manager or owner of a public resort has no right to eject a police officer who is there in performance of his duty [26]

§ 94. —— Defense of Habitation

An owner or occupant of a dwelling may use whatever reasonable force is necessary to prevent an invasion of his habitation or to protect it from a peace-disturbing intruder

The owner or occupant of a dwelling may lawfully repel force by force in defense of his habitation against one who attempts to enter in a forcible or violent manner for the apparent purpose of committing a felony therein or inflicting great bodily harm or offering personal violence to an inmate, and, if in making such defense, he endangers the life of the felonious aggressor, his act is justifiable.[27] So the owner has the right, even if necessary to the extent of the taking of life, to protect his dwelling against a peace-disturbing, profane intruder.[28] These rules, however, are not applicable where the assault was unwarranted under the circumstances,[29] or was not necessary to prevent an invasion of accused's habitation,[30] or it was made on a person who, although in accused's habitation, was peacefully leaving it at accused's direction[31]

The fact that one sleeps in a place does not necessarily make that place his habitation so that he will be justified in defending it as such[32]

§ 95. —— Defense of Third Person

One may use, in defense of a third person, as much force as reasonably appears to be necessary, even to the extent of taking life but he is entitled to only such defenses as if he had been the person attacked.

One who has good reason to believe and does believe that he is resisting a felonious assault on a third person is not guilty of assault with intent to murder[33] A fortiori one may lawfully use sufficient force to repel an assault on a relative or a member of his family even to the taking of life, if that is necessary, and he is entitled to the same defenses as if he had been the person assaulted,[34] but to no other or greater defenses[35] A relative who strikes in defense of one who he knows provoked the difficulty will be bound by the wrong of the relative defended[36] and can avail himself of the doctrine of self-defense only where the party defended had a right to strike in his own defense.[37]

The right to defend another from death or great bodily harm does not depend on the reality of the danger or on the belief of the one in danger but on the facts as they reasonably appear to the defender[38] One may resort to a deadly weapon to prevent a police officer from an unlawful search of a mere friend[39]

§ 96. Persons Liable; Accessaries, Aiders, and Abettors

Although one does not actively participate in an assault with intent to take life, he may be accountable therefor if he aids or abets in, or procures the commission of, the offense, provided he has knowledge of the assailant's intent to kill.

Where assault with intent to commit murder is made a felony, as considered supra § 73, it is an offense to which there may be accessaries,[40] except where, as in the case of other offenses, considered in Criminal Law § 82, §§ 85–89, accessaries before the fact and principals in the second degree are regarded as guilty as principals[41] Under the general rule considered in Criminal Law § 81, that the distinction between principals and accessaries applies only in cases of felony, where the assault charged is regarded only as a misdemeanor all parties implicated are guilty as principals[42]

Where defendant and others have a common design to do an unlawful act, then whatever act any one of them does in furtherance of the design is an act by all, and all are equally guilty.[43] There must, however, be a common design[44]

All persons who engage in a conspiracy to commit an assault with intent to murder are equally guilty,[45] and actual participation in the assault is not essential.[46] One who is personally present, aiding and abetting,[47] as by approving of the assault and encouraging the assailant,[48] is guilty as a principal, although he does not actively participate.

Where a number of persons conspire to commit murder, and in execution of their common purpose a felonious assault is made by some of them on the intended victim, all are guilty of assault with intent to commit murder[49] Also, where parties enter into a conspiracy to commit another offense and in the execution of their common design one of them makes an assault with intent to murder, they are all equally guilty of the felonious assault,[50] provided such act was within the contemplation of the parties[51] The aider and abetter must as a rule either act himself with a specific intent to kill or know of such intent on the part of the principal[52] So, where one aids or encourages an assault without any malice or intent to kill and without knowledge of the principal's intent to kill, he may be guilty of simple assault and battery or aggravated assault only, according to the circumstances, although the principal may be guilty of assault with intent to murder[53] Where the only evidence to connect accused with the common design to commit the assault is certain words alleged to have been spoken by him, he cannot be convicted unless the words are spoken in the hearing of the persons engaged in the assault[54]

VI. JUSTIFIABLE OR EXCUSABLE HOMICIDE

§ 97. What Constitutes in General

Justifiable homicide is the necessary killing of another in the performance of a legal duty, or where the slayer, without fault on his part, has a legal right so to kill

Excusable homicide is where the slayer, although at fault, has the legal right to kill, or where the killing is the accidental result of a lawful act done in a lawful manner and treated under particular headings in succeeding sections 100–113, or under self-defense, infra §§ 114–138, are deemed to furnish better and safer guides for the determination of what does or does not constitute excusable[55] or justifiable[56] homicide than abstract definitions Even statutory definitions and rules may fall short of a statement of the law as it has been interpreted and established by precedents and authorities of long and recognized standing.[57] If the fact of the killing is admitted, whether it was justifiable or excusable depends on the intent with which it was committed[58]

Justifiable homicide Justifiable homicide is the necessary killing of another in the performance of a legal duty or where the slayer, not being himself at fault, had a legal right so to kill,[59] the taking of human life under circumstances of justification, as a matter of right[60] It is a homicide authorized by law.[61]

Excusable homicide Excusable homicide is where the slayer, although himself at fault, had the legal right so to kill, or where the killing was the accidental result of a lawful act done in a lawful manner[62] It has also been defined as that killing which is not properly justifiable but which is allowable under certain circumstances, for example, the defense of one's own person, or that of some member of one's household, as wife, children, or servant,[63] or as that which takes place under such circumstances of accident or necessity that the party cannot be strictly said to have committed the act willfully and intentionally[64] It is committed either by misadventure or accident, as discussed infra § 112, or in self-defense on a sudden affray, infra § 114 The constituent elements of excusable homicide are three, namely, absence of intent to do harm, the lawfulness of the act resulting in death, and proper precaution to avoid mischief[65]

Under statute Within certain limits the legislature may prescribe the conditions under which homicide may be excusable or justifiable,[66] but it cannot deprive a person who is not a wrongdoer of the right of self-defense, as stated infra § 114 In many states justifiable and excusable homicides are defined by statute[67] The statutory definitions are in the main a reenactment of the common law,[68] and not in derogation thereof[69] However, in a few instances the statutes have gone further than the common law Thus, under some statutes homicide is justifiable when committed by anyone in a sudden heat of passion caused by the attempt of another to rape or otherwise defile his wife, daughter, sister, mother, or other family relation, or when the defilement has actually been committed[70] It is essential, under such a statute, that accused act while in a sudden heat of passion, and that his act follow so closely, in point of time, the acquisition of knowledge of the defilement or attempt to defile as not to allow sufficient intervening time for reflection, deliberation, and the cooling of passion [71]

§ 98. Matters Not Constituting

Homicide can be justified only by the mandate of the law, or on the ground of necessity, and not on the ground of provocation unaccompanied by acts of violence, especially where the provocation is past and heat of passion has had time to cool

The intentional taking of human life can be justified only by the mandate of the law, or on the ground of necessity [72] A homicide is not justified by any kind of provocation unaccompanied with acts of violence,[73] especially where the provocation is past and accused's heat of passion has had time to cool [74] Unless expressly so provided by statute, as discussed supra § 97, the killing of a human being in heat of passion does not constitute justifiable homicide [75] Mere words,[76] or abusive, insulting, or opprobrious epithets or language,[77] or insulting looks or gestures,[78] do not furnish a justification for taking human life Anything unknown to accused at the time of the killing cannot afford him justification.[79]

Miscellaneous matters held not to be sufficient, of themselves, to justify a homicide include the fact that deceased was tall and of athletic build,[80] the making of a proposal of marriage by deceased to a daughter of accused;[81] the fact that deceased placed accused's name on a black, unfair, or debarred list or failed to deliver to him a letter of recommendation belonging to him,[82] the fact that the victim, who was the mother-in-law of accused, notified him to stay away from her home where his wife and children were,[83] and the fact that a reward has been offered by officers of the state for the killing of deceased [84]

Excuse Accused is not entitled to be acquitted on the ground of excusable homicide merely because he killed deceased in a sudden difficulty,[85] or because of jealousy or sudden anger caused by the knowledge that deceased, his mistress, had abandoned him,[86] or merely because deceased did not answer when hailed or called [87]

Justification or excuse It is important that the taking of human life be not excused or justified except in strict accordance with the established law [88] The idea of prevention or defense against an impending or progressing wrong must enter into all cases of justifiable homicide by a private person.[89] There is neither legal justification nor excuse for a private person attempting to take the law into his own hands and deliberately killing to inflict punishment or vengeance for past crimes or wrongs against himself or members of his family, no matter how serious or heinous such wrongs or crimes may have been[90] The rule is applicable even where the past wrongs of deceased were inflicted on the wife, daughter, or other female relative of accused and consisted of improper attentions, insulting conduct, or even rape, seduction, or adultery,[91] the so-called "unwritten law" or right to avenge a criminal wrong done to a female member of one's family by killing the wrongdoer is generally not recognized or available as a defense to homicide[92] Infidelity, undue intimacy, or even illicit relations by one spouse with a third person do not furnish legal justification or excuse for the taking of the life of that spouse by the other spouse[93] Homicide is not justified or excused by the mere fact that deceased was a person of bad or low character,[94] or of shady antecedents,[95] or had been an incorrigible law violator,[96] or had had some trouble with a third party just prior to the killing[97]

A homicide is neither justified nor excused by a mistake of law as to the slayer's right to take life,[98] and it is said that a homicide is never justifiable or excusable where the slayer is at the time violating some law[99] However, a person is not criminally responsible for a homicide committed by him by reason of a mistake as to the facts, where his ignorance or mistake was not due to negligence or bad faith on his part and where he would have been exempt from criminal liability if the facts were as he had supposed them to be[1]

§ 99. Distinctions; Exemption from Liability

Justifiable homicide and excusable homicide are to be distinguished, although accused is entitled to a full acquittal and discharge in either case.

"Justifiable homicide" and "excusable homicide" are not synonymous terms,[6] and as noted from the definitions, considered supra § 97, there are important distinctions between them,[7] although they are often used synonymously,[8] and in some states the distinctions have been expressly abolished by statute and the term "justifiable homicide" alone is employed [9] A distinction which formerly existed, that the perpetrator of an excusable homicide suffered forfeiture of his goods, while in case of justifiable homicide he forfeited nothing does not exist in this country,[10] and accused is entitled to a full acquittal and discharge where the homicide is either justifiable or excusable [11] However, some courts hold that, while there must be an entire acquittal whether the killing is excusable or justifiable, nevertheless some of the distinctions between the two kinds of homicide, such as the duty to retreat in one but not in the other, should not be ignored [12]

§ 100. Exercise of Authority or Duty

Homicide necessarily or inadvertently committed by a public officer, or one acting under his authority, while in the exercise of his authority or duty is generally justifiable or excusable

Where a public officer, or one acting under his authority, in the exercise of his duty as such, takes another's life by unavoidable necessity without any will, intention, desire, negligence, or inadvertence on his part and therefore without blame,[13] as where an officer in the due execution of his office kills a person who assaults or resists him,[14] or where an officer, in punishing a criminal within bounds of moderation and within the limits of the law, unfortunately kills him, considered infra § 112, the homicide is justifiable or excusable, but not where it is committed in excess of such officer's authority or duty [15] The mere fact that a person is a peace officer does not justify him in taking life otherwise than in the execution of duties of his office,[16] he cannot justify a homicide committed by him with a deadly weapon, while he was aiding in a violation of public laws or private rights, on the ground of his right to carry arms, since he was not at the time about his official duty and within the law.[17]

§ 101. —— Prevention of Offenses

A homicide is justifiable when committed by necessity and in good faith to prevent the commission of a felony attempted by force or surprise, but not when it is committed to prevent a mere misdemeanor

The taking of human life is justifiable when done for the prevention of any atrocious crime attempted to be committed with force [18]

Felonies. According to the common law, it is the duty of every one, seeing any felony attempted, to prevent it by force, and if need be, by the extinguishment of the felon's existence.[19] A homicide is justifiable when committed by necessity and in good faith in order to prevent a felony attempted by force or surprise, such as murder, robbery, burglary, arson, rape, sodomy, and the like.[20] In applying the rule no distinction is made between statutory and common-law felonies.[21] The rule also is not confined to felonies against the person, but may be applicable to felonies against property.[22]

To justify the killing, it must be done in good faith and under an honest and reasonable belief that a felony is about to be committed and that the killing is necessary in order to prevent its accomplishment.[23] There need not be an actual necessity for the taking of life to prevent the felony, provided the circumstances are such as to impress the mind of the slayer with a reasonable belief in such necessity.[24] However, there either must be a necessity, or the circumstances must be such as to excite the fear of a reasonable man of a necessity, to take life to prevent the commission of a felony.[25] A bare fear of the commission of a felony is not sufficient to constitute a justification.[26] To be justifiable, the killing must be done while the person killed is in the act of committing the offense, or after some act done by him showing an evident intent to commit such offense.[27] It generally must be done for the prevention of a felony and not as a punishment for a felony already committed,[28] although, under some statutes, the killing is justified, in case of robbery, if it is done while the robber is in the presence of the victim or fleeing with the property taken,[29] or, in case of burglary or theft by night, if it is done while the offender is in the building or at the place where the felony is committed or within gunshot thereof.[30]

The mere intent of a person to commit a felony, without any overt act indicative of such intention, will not justify the killing of such person by way of prevention,[31] and after the necessity has ceased, and the supposed felon flees and thereby abandons his supposed design, a killing in pursuit is not justified however well founded the belief may be that he had intended to commit a felony.[32] The necessity must exist at the time, the mere opinion of the slayer that a crime might be committed at some time in the future is not sufficient as a justification.[33] Killing to prevent a felony is not justifiable if the felony is a secret one, or unaccompanied by force,[34] or if it does not involve the security of the person or home,[35] or where the commission of the felony is problematical or remote.[36]

Misdemeanors. A homicide committed to prevent a mere misdemeanor is not justifiable, either by a private citizen or an officer.[37] A person has no right to kill to prevent a mere trespass,[38] amounting only to a misdemeanor,[39] which is unaccompanied by imminent danger of great bodily harm or felony and which does not produce in his mind a reasonable belief of such danger.[40] However, the rule is otherwise and a homicide is justifiable where the trespasser has the intent and the means to commit a forcible trespass and a felony if necessary to accomplish the end intended.[41]

§ 102. —— Making Arrest or Preventing Escape

a. In general
b In case of felony
c In case of misdemeanor
d Preventing escape of, or rearresting, convict
e Killing rescuer

a. In General

If an officer of the law, or other person authorized to make an arrest, uses proper and necessary means or force in making an arrest or preventing the prisoner's escape and is resisted, and the resisting person is unavoidably killed in the struggle, the homicide is justifiable.

In accordance with the rules relating to the use of force in making an arrest or preventing an escape in criminal cases, as discussed in Arrest § 13, an officer of the law or other person authorized to make an arrest, who uses proper means in making the arrest or preventing the prisoner's escape and is resisted may repel force with force, and if the person resisting is unavoidably killed in the struggle, the homicide is justifiable,[42] and since in such cases the killing is done by the officer in the performance of his duties to effect the arrest or imprisonment, the doctrine of self-defense has no application,[43] and the officer is not required to retreat before an assailing or resisting prisoner.[44] However he is not justified in using unnecessary force or resorting to the use of firearms or other dangerous weapons where with diligence and caution the prisoner can be otherwise arrested and detained,[45] although this does not require that he shall call bystanders to assist in making the arrest.[46] As otherwise stated, a homicide is justifiable where it results from the use, by the officer or person making the arrest, of such force as is reasonably necessary to overcome the resistance offered and to make the arrest or prevent the escape of the person under lawful arrest,[47] and where the arrest and imprisonment are legal, and the resistance of the prisoner is met without unnecessary force or violence, the homicide is justifiable, even though the officer may have entertained improper motives or purposes.[48] Even though the arrest is illegal, if the officer, a known peace officer, has acted in good faith, he may be justified in killing to overcome resistance after the arrest has been made, but not where he has acted in bad faith in attempting the arrest[49]

A homicide is not justifiable, however, where it was committed by an officer in attempting to arrest deceased during the course of a difficulty brought on by the officer,[50] or where it was committed by a person without authority to make an arrest in killing another person who has committed no offense,[51] or where the offense was not known until after the killing[52] Accused cannot invoke the doctrine of the right of an officer to kill if necessary, in making an arrest where he neither made an arrest nor a reasonable effort to make an arrest and deceased made no effort to evade arrest or to escape from the officer[53] An officer is not protected in killing a person being arrested without a warrant, where it is not evident that the arrest is for an offense committed in the officer's presence or that there is an attempt to escape,[54] or where the arrest is unlawful and only reasonable force is used in resisting it;[55] or where the officer has failed to perform his statutory duty of making known his authority and the cause of the arrest and where, therefore, the person being arrested is under no duty to submit,[56] unless the offender knows that he is being pursued for the purpose of arrest, and knows the offense with which he is charged[57] Under some statutes, an officer or other person executing an order of arrest is not justified in killing a person who attempts to escape unless the life of the officer is endangered or he is threatened with great bodily injury[58]

b. In Case of Felony

Homicide committed in attempting to arrest or prevent the escape of a felon is generally justifiable where otherwise the arrest cannot be made or the escape prevented

Homicide committed by a public officer or private citizen while attempting in a lawful manner and by the necessary use of force to arrest or prevent the escape of a felon, whether in fleeing from arrest or in attempting to escape after he has been taken, is justifiable where otherwise the arrest cannot be made or the escape prevented,[59] as where the

felon's life is taken in the course of using such force in effecting his arrest and in overcoming his resistance, or in preventing his escape, as is necessary, or as appears to the arresting officer or citizen, in the exercise of a reasonable discretion, to be necessary.[60] In order to justify the killing the arresting officer or citizen is not limited to the use of such force as is necessary to protect himself from death or great bodily harm, or to the right of self-defense available to a private citizen,[61] although of course the right of self-defense is available to him in a proper case, as discussed infra § 137 However, it has been held that a private person is justified in killing only in self-defense,[62] and that he has no right to kill simply to prevent the person sought to be arrested from going away[63] If the arrest was made without a warrant to justify the homicide the felony must either have been committed in the view or presence of the person making the arrest,[64] or he must have reasonable cause to believe and must in good faith have believed that deceased has committed a felony and is trying to escape,[65] and a mere indefinite suspicion of that fact is insufficient[66] Some authorities hold that in such a case the killing cannot be justified without proof of guilt, however reasonable the grounds of belief[67] There must also be a necessity for the killing in order to justify it,[68] and according to some authorities it is sufficient that there is an apparent[69] or probable necessity,[70] but on the other hand positive necessity has been required[71]

timidating and injuring nonunion workers and compelling them to quit their work, is justifiable.[72]

c. In Case of Misdemeanor

An officer or person authorized to make an arrest ordinarily is not justified in killing a mere misdemeanant in order to effectuate his arrest or prevent his escape, unless it becomes necessary to kill in overcoming resistance offered.

An officer is not justified in killing a mere misdemeanant in order to effectuate his arrest or to prevent his escape after arrest,[73] and a private person assisting in the arrest, at the request of the officer, is subject to the same limitation.[74] The rule is commonly applied by holding that the killing of a misdemeanant while in flight is not justifiable.[75] Homicide, however, may be justified, under the rules justifying a homicide committed by an officer in making an arrest for a felony, where the conduct of a person in resisting an arrest on a misdemeanor charge is such as to constitute a felony committed in the presence of the officer,[76] or where the misdemeanor is flagrant, as where a dangerous wound has been inflicted or a riot exists, for the presumption is very great that the offense will turn out to be a felony.[77] Ordinarily in cases of misdemeanor an arresting officer's or citizen's right to kill is limited to self-defense,[78] but, where the offender forcibly resists arrest or, while in custody, uses force and violence to overpower the officer and accomplish his escape, the right of the officer to kill is not limited to the single ground of self-defense,[79] as in such a case he is entitled to use such force as is reasonably necessary to overcome the resistance offered even to the extent of taking life,[80] provided the resistance offered is such that in overcoming it and in making the arrest or preventing the escape the officer is placed in danger of loss of life or great bodily harm.[81] Where, under the circumstances, a private citizen is without authority to make an arrest for a misdemeanor without a warrant, he is not justified in taking life on meeting with resistance to an attempted arrest,[82] and the same is true where an officer is attempting to make an illegal arrest without a warrant, as for a misdemeanor not committed in his presence.[83] The person protected in taking life while employing such force as is reasonably necessary to overcome the resistance to an arrest for a misdemeanor is an officer engaged in the discharge of an official duty.[84]

d. Preventing Escape of, or Rearresting, Convict

Homicide is justifiable when committed to prevent the escape of a convict, but not in all cases when committed by a guard in attempting to rearrest an escaped convict.

Where a convict tries to escape, or where the circumstances are such as to lead his guard, as a reasonable man, honestly to conclude that the convict is trying to escape and that it is necessary for him to shoot and kill in order to prevent the escape, it is justifiable homicide,[85] but a statute authorizing the taking of life to prevent such an escape has been held to apply only to an escaping convict who is a felon, and not a misdemeanant.[86] However, this right does not extend to a guard or other person attempting to rearrest an escaped convict, he has only such authority as belongs to an ordinary officer in making an arrest,[87] nor is an officer authorized to use firearms to compel a misdemeanor convict to return to service or obey the officer's orders.[88]

e. Killing Rescuer

The killing, under circumstances of reasonable necessity, of one who attempts to rescue a prisoner from an officer who has him in custody is justifiable.

Where it is necessary, in order to prevent an escape, an officer may be justified in killing a person who attempts to rescue his prisoner.[89] However, the officer is not justified in killing for this purpose unless there is an apparent necessity for it,[90] and the law does not clothe him with authority to judge arbitrarily of the necessity of killing the rescuer.[91]

§ 103. —— Suppression of Riot or Affray

Homicide committed, when necessary, to suppress a riot or affray and preserve the peace is justifiable.

Force must be directed against officer to constitute forcible resistance to arrest which will justify homicide —Hill v Commonwealth, 40 S W 2d 261, 239 Ky 646

Refusal of driver of automobile to heed traffic officer's warning to stop does not amount to forcible resistance to arrest, justifying homicide — Hill v Commonwealth, supra

Statutory provisions

A statute providing that homicide shall be justifiable when necessarily committed in attempting by lawful ways and means to apprehend any person for any felony committed does not negative right of officer to use all force reasonably necessary to effect and maintain against resistance the arrest of a misdemeanant, especially in view of statute providing that if, after notice of intention to arrest accused, he either flee or forcibly resist, the officer may use all necessary means to effect the arrest —State v Ford, 130 S W 2d 635, 344 Mo 1219

A public officer, or even a private citizen, will be justified in committing a homicide where it is necessary in order to suppress a riot or affray and preserve the peace,[92] but the mere fact that a person is requested to assist in preserving the peace does not of itself justify a homicide committed by him during the altercation[93]

§ 104. —— Quelling Disturbance among Prisoners

A homicide necessarily committed in quelling a disturbance among prisoners is justifiable.

A gaoler who is resisted in quelling a disturbance is justified in repelling force by force even if death should ensue[94] However, he is not justified in coming to extremities without a reasonable necessity therefor,[95] and is not justified in beating a prisoner to death because he fears that his unruly conduct may perhaps incite other prisoners to attempt to escape from jail[96]

§ 105. —— Obeying Order of Superior Officer

A homicide committed under the order of a superior officer is not for that reason justifiable

A homicide is not justified by the fact that it is committed under the order of a superior officer[97] The order of a superior officer does not justify a municipal policeman or other officer in striking a prisoner in custody a blow which results in death where either the order is unlawful or the act ordered to be done is unlawful[98]

§ 106. —— Execution of Criminal

The execution of a prisoner in pursuance of the sentence of a competent court and in strict conformity therewith is justifiable homicide.

Where a sheriff or other proper officer hangs or otherwise executes a prisoner in pursuance of the sentence of a competent court and in strict conformity therewith, the homicide is justifiable[99]

§ 107. —— Killing by Soldier

A homicide committed by a soldier without malice in the performance of his duty is justifiable.

A homicide committed by a soldier without malice in the performance of his duty,[1] as where he kills an alien enemy in the heat and exercise of war,[2] or kills under the order of a superior officer,[3] which does not expressly and clearly show its illegality on its face,[4] is justifiable However, a willful killing by a soldier is not necessarily a justifiable homicide[5] Obedience to an order of a superior officer does not constitute a justification where the order is manifestly beyond the scope of the officer's authority and the soldier must know as a man of ordinary understanding that the act is illegal[6] To justify the taking of life on the ground of public war it must be what is known by the law of nations as lawful war[7] A person is not relieved from responsibility for the killing of another by the fact that he acted under the order of an officer of insurgent or revolutionary forces[8] In times of peace a militiaman has no more right to take human life than any other officer or citizen, even though ordered by a superior officer to do a certain act at all hazards, he is authorized to use only such means to accomplish the desired result as are necessary without taking life or committing an assault.[9]

a. In General

Homicide in defense of another person is justified or excused when the killing is done under such circumstances that the person defended would be justified or excused if he had committed the homicide in his own defense. It is generally necessary that neither the person defended nor the defender be at fault in bringing on the difficulty; and that the person defended shall be in imminent danger of death, great bodily harm, or some felony at the time, or it shall be reasonably apparent to the slayer, or he shall honestly and reasonably believe, that the person defended is in such danger and that it is necessary to kill to save him therefrom.

As a general proposition, a person is justified or excused in killing in defense of another person when, and only when, the circumstances are such that the latter person would be justified or excused if he had committed the homicide in his own defense. A person interfering in a difficulty in behalf of another simply steps in the latter's shoes; he may lawfully do in another's defense what such other might lawfully do in his own defense but no more; he stands on the same plane, is entitled to the same rights, and is subject to the same conditions, limitations, and responsibilities as the person defended, and his act must receive the same construction as the act of the person defended would receive if the homicide had been committed by him[10] This rule may be subject to qualifications based on accused's lack of knowledge of the facts and circumstances,[11] but in general it is necessary and sufficient to justify or excuse a homicide in defense of another that neither the person defended nor the defender shall be at fault in bringing on the difficulty,[12] or that, if he has provoked the attack, he shall in good faith withdraw from the combat before the killing,[13] that the danger, real or apparent, to the person defended shall be of death, great bodily harm, or a felony,[14] that it shall be present, imminent, and impending,[15] and not a past danger;[16] that either the person defended shall be in real danger of death, great bodily harm, or some

Rule not applicable where evidence conflicting

The rule that one may not by the commission of a felonious assault provoke a deadly counterattack on himself or another, and in the course of the counterattack kill the assailant and then invoke defense of another, does not prevent accused from relying on such defense when the evidence is incomplete and in irreconcilable conflict, not only as to the purpose and intent with which accused and her codefendants entered deceased's home, but also as to the nature and magnitude of the initial assault, and as to whether or not deceased, or accused and her codefendants, were the aggressors.—People v. felony at the time, or it shall be reasonably apparent to the slayer, or he shall honestly and reasonably believe, that the person defended is in such danger, and that it is necessary to kill to save him therefrom,[17] that the person defended shall retreat if he can do so without increasing his peril,[18] that neither the person defended nor accused could have averted the apparent danger by any reasonably safe means other than the killing of deceased,[19] and that the defender shall not use more force than is necessary or reasonably appears to him to be necessary to save the person defended from death or great bodily harm[20]

Accused's knowledge of aggression or provocation by person defended In some states the rule that a homicide is not justifiable or excusable as in defense of another, where the person defended is the aggressor or provokes the difficulty, is applied where accused has knowledge of the aggression or provocation,[21] but not where he is without knowledge, or a reasonable opportunity to acquire knowledge, and is himself without blame[22] In other states the rule is applied where the person defended is actually at fault, even though accused is without knowledge of such fault and has had no opportunity to acquire knowledge thereof,[23] or even though he entertains an honest and reasonable belief that the person defended is not at fault[24]

b. Of Particular Persons

Homicide may be justified or excused when it is committed by a person in defense of another who bears to him a close natural or civil relationship.

Subject to the rules, as considered supra subdivision a of this section, as to the requisites of a justifiable or excusable homicide in defense of another, a person is justified or excused, both at common law and under statute, in taking life in defense of another who bears to him a close natural civil or family relationship,[25] such as a parent,[26] child,[27] husband or wife,[28] brother or sister,[29] uncle, nephew, or niece,[30] guardian or ward,[31] or master or servant.[32] A person is also justified or excused in killing to prevent the commission of a known felony by violence or surprise on any person in his presence or company, including even a stranger,[33] or guest,[34] or accused's paramour.[35] It has been held that justifiable interference in defense of a near relation does not extend beyond cases where a serious injury is threatened to a wife or husband, child or servant,[36] and that, where statutes enumerating the relatives in defense of whom a homicide is justifiable do not expressly include brothers and sisters, they cannot be included by construction.[37] On the other hand similar statutes have been construed not to provide an exclusive enumeration but rather to ingraft the common-law rule into the statutes of the state, and the statutes, with the common-law rule so incorporated, undoubtedly apply to the defense of a brother as well as to the defense of a wife or other relative specifically named in the statutes.[38]

c. Against Sexual Offenses

Homicide committed as being necessary to prevent the prepetration of a sexual offense, such as ravishment or under some statutes, adultery, on a wife or daughter is generally held to be justifiable.

Under the rule that the husband has the same right to defend his wife against a wrong committed in his presence, as the wife would have to defend herself,[39] where a husband discovered another in the act of ravishing or attempting to ravish his wife, and the taking of the life of such person reasonably appeared to be necessary to protect the wife from the assault, the husband was justified in taking life as fully as the wife would have been.[40] However, accused is not wholly excused or exempted from criminal liability where the means employed to repel the attack on the wife's honor went beyond those reasonably necessary to obtain the object in view,[41] as where deceased was unarmed and defenseless and the circumstances did not require that accused, after striking the first blow, should continue the attack[42] A father, who acts in good faith and on reasonable appearances of imminent danger, has a right to defend his daughter against an assault with intent to rape, regardless of what her reputation may be, and he has the right to act immediately and with the most effective means at his command, and the law will hold him guiltless, even though it may subsequently turn out that he could have saved her by pursuing some course other than the instant killing of her assailant[43] For a homicide to be justifiable as in defense of the honor and chastity of the wife or daughter, it must be to prevent an impending or progressing wrong,[44] and not for a past offense[45] or anticipated attempt[46] It is held that a husband is not justified in killing another to prevent the seduction or debauching of his wife by artifice or fraud,[47] or for an assault on her virtue, where it is shown that she was not virtuous[48] A statute justifying homicide for defilement applies where deceased was discovered in an unnatural act of sexual perversion with defendant's daughter[49]

Adultery Unless so provided by statute, the husband is not entirely excused or justified in taking the life of another whom he discovers in the act of adultery with the wife,[50] as this is an act consented to by her and as she would have no right to take the life of her paramour because of the act committed, her husband, acting in her defense, has no greater right.[51] Under some statutes, however, a husband has as much right to protect his wife from adultery as from other felonies, and if it is necessary to prevent its perpetration, he is justified in taking life,[52] provided he has not forfeited the right by his previous conduct[53] Under some statutes of this nature, after the act of adultery has been committed by the wife, the husband is not justified in killing her paramour, the killing must be to prevent new acts of adultery with the wife,[54] the danger must be present and impending,[55] urgent and pressing,[56] and the killing must be necessary, or apparently necessary, to prevent the act of adultery[57] Under other statutes, however, the homicide is justifiable when committed by the husband on the person of anyone taken in the act of adultery with the wife, provided the killing takes place before the parties to the act of adultery have separated[58] "Adultery," as used in such a statute, means adultery as known in common parlance, whether consisting of one or more acts, and not statutory adultery consisting of a living together or habitual carnal intercourse,[59] and the expression "before the parties to the act of adultery have separated" does not require that the parties be still physically united in the act of copulation, but contemplates only that the parties be still together in company with each other, after the act, when the homicide is committed[60] Accused is entitled to act on appearances, where the circumstances are such

If there was actual danger, or if it reasonably appeared that there was danger, of deceased committing future act of adultery with accused's daughter, and such danger demanded immediate action to prevent it, danger would be impending and would justify killing if, either actually or as it reasonably appeared to accused, danger could not be otherwise prevented than by death of deceased—Green v State, 183 S E 204, 52 Ga App 290

as to cause him reasonably to believe from his standpoint, when he arrives on the scene, that his wife and deceased have just committed adultery, or are about to commit it, he is authorized to kill [61] In applying the statute the place where the homicide occurs is immaterial, the statute makes no exception in favor of one place or another but is broad enough to cover every place.[62]

§ 109. Defense of Habitation

a In general
b What constitutes habitation
c Nature of intrusion or danger
d Means of preventing or repelling intrusion

a. In General

Homicide in defense of habitation is justified where the killing is actually or apparently necessary in order to repel a person who attempts to enter in a forcible or violent manner for the apparent purpose of committing a felony therein on either person or property or of inflicting great bodily harm or offering personal violence to a person dwelling or being therein.

It is a general rule, expressly affirmed by statute in some states, that a person is justified in taking life in defense of his habitation where it is actually or apparently necessary to do so in order to repel another person who attempts to enter in a forcible or violent manner for the apparent purpose of committing a felony therein on either person or property or of inflicting great bodily harm or of assaulting or offering personal violence to a person dwelling or being therein.[63] The principle that the taking of life in defense of habitation is excusable or justifiable is not applicable to a common brawl for which accused was mainly responsible,[64] or to a case where deceased was on a public highway in front of accused's house and was not attempting to enter or to make any forcible attack or invasion,[65] or where, although deceased was attempting at the time unlawfully to enter accused's dwelling house, the killing was done with malice and ill will and not for self-protection or protection of the habitation [66]

Against person lawfully in house. The rights of a householder against a violent intruder have no relevancy, and the ordinary rules as to self defense are alone applicable, where deceased was not even a trespasser but was lawfully in the house, as where he and accused were members of the same family and household,[67] or he was in the house as a guest or visitor,[68] or where he was armed with a writ giving him the legal right to take possession of the dwelling for the purpose of ejecting accused and his household goods from it,[69] or where he was in the act of reasonably searching the premises under permission to do so,[70] or under the authority of a search warrant,[71] unless accused was not shown, and had no knowledge of, such warrant.[72] However, homicide in defense of the home may be resorted to as against one who, after lawfully entering the home, was guilty of conduct justifying his expulsion, and was killed in resisting such expulsion.[73]

Who may exercise such right of defense The right to take life in a proper case in defense of habitation may be exercised not only by the owner or occupant of the house[74] but also by his servants[75] and guests,[76] and even a bystander may be called by the owner to aid in ejecting another from his home.[77]

b. What Constitutes Habitation

Habitation which may be defended, even to the extent of taking life, includes any place where a person lives and which is his home and place of abode

The habitation which may be defended, even to the extent of taking life, includes any place where a person lives and which is his only home and place of abode,[78] even though he lives there with a woman in illicit relationship,[79] and even though it is a mere tent[80] or a box stall.[81] It includes outbuildings within the curtilage,[82] but it does not extend beyond the curtilage or the limits of the dwelling and the customary outbuildings,[83] and on the theory that a man is entitled to defend his house, not as property, but as his castle affording protection to his person, it is held that the rule does not apply to the lot of ground or yard on which the house stands.[84] In a restricted sense, a barn[85] or an automobile[86] may be regarded for the time being as a man's "castle" which he is entitled to defend for the protection of himself and others therein. It has also been held that a person has a right to take life to prevent the violent entry or assault on his place of business for the apparent purpose of inflicting death or great bodily injury on an occupant,[87] but on the other hand it has been

Effect of challenge by accused
Where following altercation with deceased accused publicly posted challenge to deceased and the challenge was to come to house of accused, accused had no greater or less right in house where he was a guest than in his own home, and where the two houses were located near each other on same farm, challenge extended to house in which accused was a guest, and in such a case the applicable legal principles involved an admixture of law of habitation and mutual combat.—State v. A mere demonstration by deceased in front of accused's place of business did not constitute such an as-

held that a public place of business cannot be defended against intrusion as a dwelling house or private habitation even though a person sleeps and keeps articles of clothing therein [88]

c. Nature of Intrusion or Danger

To justify a homicide in defense of a habitation, there must be a manifest attempt to make a forcible and unlawful entry into the home, with the intent to commit a felony therein or to inflict great bodily harm on an occupant thereof, and the danger of accomplishing such acts must be imminent

The right to take life in defense of one's dwelling house arises only where the security or sanctity of the home is invaded or threatened,[89] and is subject to the qualification that the danger must be imminent and immediate and not a past danger [90] It is not practicable to formulate a rule applicable to all cases for determining what act or conduct constitutes an attempt to enter a house, the question is one more of fact than of law and must be determined by the circumstances of each case [91] The attempt must be manifest, that is, it must be so plainly made that no reasonable doubt exists as to the purpose of the aggressor,[92] and a mere demonstration, or even threat, to break into a house will not justify a homicide by the occupant [93] However, the killing of a person attempting to enter a house after being forbidden to do so may be justified by his menacing attitude and threats at the time [94]

In order that a homicide may be justifiable as in defense of habitation, it is not essential that there be peril of death or great bodily harm,[95] for, as considered supra subdivision a of this section, a violent attempt to enter with the apparent purpose of assaulting or offering personal violence to an inmate justifies defense of the habitation and an assault or offer of personal violence does not necessarily imply danger of death or great bodily harm [96] While homicide in defense of habitation is justifiable when actually or apparently necessary to repel an attempt to commit a felony, the courts are not agreed on the question whether an actual or apparent felonious purpose on the part of the assailant or intruder is necessary to the justification of the householder, some courts holding that the right to take life in defense of one's dwelling is limited to occasions where it is at least reasonably apparent that the intruder is actuated by felonious purpose,[97] and other courts stating broadly, without this qualification, that a person in his own dwelling house may use such means as are necessary, even to the taking of life, to prevent a forcible and unlawful entry,[98] or construing statutes not to require the assault, personal violence, or serious injury intended or threatened to amount to a felony, if perpetrated, in order to justify the taking of life in defense of habitation [99] In a few states it is a rule that there must be danger either of a felony, loss of life, or great bodily harm [1]

time committing a felony by attempting to break into and burglarize the house,[3] or even though he is attempting to escape,[4] but after he has entered, although burglariously, the owner has no right to kill him for the act of entry already committed[5] The owner does not lose the right to kill by reason of the fact that the burglar seizes the owner's weapon to prevent him from enforcing the right, unless the burglar surrenders himself[6]

Trespass An owner of a house may resist a trespass with force,[7] but he is not justified in killing to repel a mere civil or nonfelonious trespass[8] unaccompanied by any offer of violence[9] Even where the trespass is forcible and against accused's objections, this fact alone does not justify or excuse the taking of life,[10] to excuse the homicide it is essential that the taking of life shall be believed by accused to be necessary or reasonably necessary to protect himself or his family from danger[11] The mere fact that one knocks at the door of another's house in the nighttime does not confer on the latter a legal right to kill[12]

Attack by one or more persons Some statutes, by the use of the plural "persons," require an attack by two or more persons in order to justify a homicide in defense of habitation against an assault or offer of personal violence, but do not require action by more than one to justify a homicide in defense of habitation against an attempt to commit a felony, or to prevent a forcible attack and invasion of habitation after persuasion, remonstrance, and other gentle measures have first been used[13]

d. Means of Preventing or Repelling Intrusion

Homicide in defense of habitation generally is justified when it results from the use of such force only as is necessary or apparently necessary to prevent or repel the unlawful intrusion or aggression.

To justify a homicide as in defense of habitation, accused must use no greater force than is necessary or apparently necessary to a reasonably prudent man[14] The force used by him must be neither greater in degree[15] nor earlier[16] or later in point of time than is necessary or apparently necessary Where the aggressor has ceased in his attempt to enter, or has been expelled, accused is not justified in subsequently taking his life[17] It is the duty of the householder to prevent the entry of his house by means not fatal if he can do so consistently with safety.[18] Where a person is already in the house, as where he is a guest or even a trespasser, he should be first requested to leave, and, on his refusal, other means short of taking life should be first resorted to before employment of that extreme means can be justified or excused,[19] and he is entitled to a reasonable time to depart before force may be used to eject him[20] If, however, he refuses to leave when the owner makes such demand, the owner may use as much force, even to the extent of taking his life, as may be reasonably necessary to accomplish the expulsion[21] Under some statutes an owner or occupant may not intentionally kill another solely in defense of habitation,[22] but he is not required to retreat if an intruder resists ejection, and may intentionally take the intruder's life if he has reason to believe, and does believe, that his life is in danger, or that he is in danger of receiving great bodily harm[23] However, where a person is attempting to break into the dwelling house of another in the nighttime with the intent to commit a felony, the owner may at once resort to the extremity of taking life.[24] Under some statutes every other effort in his power must be made by the occupant to repel the intrusion or aggression before he is justified in killing in defense of habitation[25] Persuasion, remonstrance, warning or other gentle measures must be first used in order to justify a homicide to prevent a forcible attack on, and invasion of, the habitation,[26] unless it is apparent from the circumstances that such a warning or remonstrance would be ineffective,[27] as where a person manifestly intends or endeavors by violence or surprise to commit a felony on the habitation.[28]

§ 110. Defense of Property

Homicide in defense of property, real or personal, is justifiable only where it is committed against one who manifestly intends and endeavors by violence or surprise to commit a felony on the property, and where the employment of reasonable force in protection of the property is resisted by means likely to produce death or great bodily harm

A person may use such force as is reasonably necessary to protect his property, real or personal, in his possession,[29] and, where the employment of such reasonable force by him is resisted with means likely to produce death or to inflict great bodily harm on him, he is justified in killing,[30] unless he was at fault in bringing on the difficulty,[31] or the trespass or wrong was completed before the altercation arose.[32] Where, however, there is no element of personal danger,[33] he is not justified or excused in taking life in defense of such property, other than his habitation, in order to prevent or resist a mere civil or nonfelonious trespass,[34] or larceny,[35] or wrongful taking or detention,[36] or other act or offense less than a felony[37] attempted by violence or surprise.[38] If no felony is attempted, and the owner is unable to prevent a trespass by any means short of taking or endangering life, he must suffer the trespass and seek redress at law.[39]

to restrict his right to that of defense of his property where he was attacked by deceased and took the life of deceased in order to save his own [42] The mere fact that the homicide took place on premises involved in controversy and litigation between deceased and accused does not necessarily characterize it as a homicide in defense of property,[43] and the fact that an intruding claimant acted in good faith in attempting to eject the rightful possessor in forcibly resisting the latter's efforts to eject him is no defense to his killing of such possessor, since his efforts were unlawful [44]

Necessity and sufficiency of possession A person has no right to slay another merely to protect his property where he is not in possession thereof Where property has been wrongfully taken from a person, or he is not in possession and cannot obtain possession by peaceable means, his sole means of redress is an appeal to the law, he has no right to resort to force or take life in order to obtain or regain possession,[45] and, a fortiori, he has no right to slay in revenge,[46] but it has been held that, in case of a robbery, the right to kill does not end as soon as there is such a change of possession of the property as will render the crime technically complete, but remains with the owner as long as his property is in his immediate presence, to prevent its being carried away,[47] and that in case of a burglary the killing may be done at any stage of the burglary, if it is reasonably necessary to prevent the final completion of the felony.[48]

Under some statutes, although the case does not fall within the terms of a particular statute justifying a homicide in defense of property to prevent anyone of certain enumerated offenses, mostly felonies, nevertheless the homicide may be justified as in protection of property against other unlawful and violent attack,[49] provided the possession was of corporeal property and not a mere right, it was actual and not merely constructive, and it was legal, although the right to the property might not have been in the possessor, provided the killing took place while the deceased was in the very act of making the unlawful and violent attack,[50] and provided the possessor resorted to all other means available at the time and made every effort in his power to prevent injury and repel the aggression before killing,[51] but this did not require the owner to have left premises to institute legal proceedings to prevent the aggression [52] Where a person is acting alone or personally in defense of his property, it is not essential under such a statute to the exercise of his right to defend that the threatened injury to his property be accompanied by violence to himself,[53] but, where a third person interfered in behalf of one whose property was attacked, a killing by such third person is not justifiable unless the life or the person of the property owner was in peril by reason of the attack on his property [54]

§ 111. —— Right to Set Spring Guns

Homicide by means of a spring gun or other like instrument, placed for the protection of property, is justifiable or excusable only where, under the circumstances, accused would have a right in person to take life for the protection of the property or of his life or person

A person is not justified or excused in placing spring guns or other like instruments of destruction for the protection of his property where he would not be justified in taking life with his own hands for its protection or for the protection of his life or person, as in the case of mere trespass,[55]

§ 112. Accident or Misfortune

a In general
b Elements of defense
c While defending against attack

a. In General

A homicide by accident, misadventure, or misfortune ordinarily is excusable where it is accidentally committed while doing a lawful act in a careful and lawful manner and without an unlawful intent

Homicide by misadventure is the accidental killing of another, where the slayer is doing a lawful act unaccompanied by any criminally careless or reckless conduct.[59] A homicide committed by accident,[60] misadventure,[61] or misfortune[62] is excusable, and, as in other cases of excusable homicide, the slayer is not criminally responsible therefor.[63] It is a general rule, expressly declared by statute in a number of states, that where a man while doing a lawful act in a careful and lawful manner and without an unlawful intent accidentally kills another it is excusable homicide.[64] The homicide is excusable if death unfortunately ensued where a parent was correcting his child or a master or teacher his apprentice or pupil, and the bounds of moderation were not exceeded either in the manner, the instrument, or the quantity of punishment,[65] where an officer was punishing a criminal in moderation and within the limits of the law,[66] where a person was at work with a hatchet and the head flew off and killed a bystander,[67] where a physician or surgeon or one acting as such administered a drug or performed an operation with due skill and caution,[68] and, under some circumstances, where a pistol or other firearm was accidentally and unintentionally,[69]

or even intentionally,[70] discharged, as where an innocent bystander was killed in a justifiable assault on a third person,[71] or where a soldier accidentally killed a third person in shooting at a fleeing prisoner, to prevent his escape.[72]

b. Elements of Defense

In order that a homicide by misadventure may be excusable, the act resulting in death must have been a lawful one; it must have been done with reasonable care and due regard for the lives and persons of others; and the killing must have been accidental and without unlawful intent or evil design.

Three elements enter into the defense of excusable homicide by misadventure. The act resulting in death must have been a lawful one,[73] it must have been done with reasonable care and due regard for the lives and persons of others;[74] and the killing must have been accidental and not intentional,[75] or without unlawful intent,[76] or without evil design or intention on the part of the slayer.[77] All these elements must concur and the absence of any one of them will involve in guilt.[78] Even though the homicide was unintentional, it is not excusable where it was the result or incident of an unlawful act,[79] such as pointing or presenting a gun, pistol or other firearm at another person in such a manner as to constitute an offense under the laws of the state,[80] or unlawfully striking another with an intent to hurt, although not with an intent to kill.[81] Likewise the homicide is not excusable where it was the result of an act done with such recklessness or carelessness as to amount to gross or criminal neg-

Contention that codefendant did not intend to fire the gun and that the gun, by reason of the wearing of its parts, was capable of being automatically discharged several times by a single pressure on trigger, did not present a defense to murder of the first degree, especially where evidence did not show that such condition existed in the death gun.—People v. ligence,[82] unless the carelessness was of such a low degree or trivial character in the performance of a lawful act as not to involve criminality,[83] and also is not excusable where it was the result of an act done with unlawful intent even though it was done with usual and ordinary caution and under ordinary circumstances would have been lawful.[84] The distinction has been made that, in the absence of statute to the contrary, if the unlawful act was malum in se misadventure does not excuse the homicide,[85] but that if the unlawful act was malum prohibitum, misadventure may excuse the homicide unless such act is shown to be the proximate cause thereof.[86]

Under some statutes, in addition to other cases of accident or misfortune corresponding to the general rule, homicide is excusable when committed by accident and misfortune in the heat of passion, on any sudden and sufficient provocation, or on a sudden combat, when no undue advantage was taken, or any dangerous weapon used, and when the killing was not done in a cruel and unusual manner.[87] In order to excuse a homicide under such a statute, the case must be brought within its terms; the killing must not only have been committed by accident and misfortune,[88] but no undue advantage must have been taken or dangerous weapon used.[89]

c. While Defending against Attack

The homicide is excusable or justifiable where, while a person is lawfully acting in self-defense, the death of his assailant results from accident or misadventure, or an innocent bystander is killed by a random shot, if under the circumstances, the killing of the person intended to be killed would have been excusable or justifiable, as in self-defense.

Ordinarily the law of self-defense is not applicable in a case of a killing resulting from an act which was accidental and unintentional,[90] particularly where the facts of the case are not such as would make such law applicable.[91] However, where the defense of excusable homicide by misadventure is relied on, the principles of self-defense may be involved, not for the purpose of establishing defense of self, but for the purpose of determining whether accused was or was not at the time engaged in a lawful act,[92] and it has been held that in such case the right, but not the law, of self-defense is invoked.[93] Accused is entitled to an acquittal where he was lawfully acting in self-defense and the death of his assailant resulted from accident or misadventure,[94] as where in falling he struck or overturned an object and thereby received injuries resulting in his death,[95] or where in a struggle over the possession of a weapon it was accidentally discharged.[96] However, death resulting from a blow intentionally struck in a fight cannot be deemed an accidental killing, it is either felonious or excusable on the ground of self-defense.[97]

By person other than deceased The unintentional killing of a bystander, as by a random shot fired in the proper and prudent exercise of the right of self-defense, is excusable or justifiable if the killing of the person intended to be killed would, under all the circumstances, have been excusable or justifiable as in self-defense.[98] Where, however, the killing of the person intended could not have been excused or justified under the circumstances, the accidental killing of another is not excusable or justifiable,[99] as where accused sought and brought on the difficulty.[1] In other words, the inquiry is whether the killing would have been justifiable if accused had killed the person whom he intended to kill, as the unintended act derives its character from the intended act.[2] Accused is entitled to acquittal where it appears that he drew a pistol without any intention of shooting or shooting at another person, but only for the purpose of frightening such other person and causing him to desist from an attack on accused, and a third person grasped the pistol and in the ensuing struggle it was accidentally discharged and the third person was thereby killed,[3] accused cannot be charged with careless negligent handling of the pistol in the scuffle.[4]

he failed to embrace an opportunity to escape or protect himself after being threatened,[6] or where the compulsion was not such as to make accused a mere physical instrument acting without will of his own and moved exclusively by another,[7] nor, if unlawful, can it be justified by the fact that it was committed under the commands of another.[8] Even extreme and inevitably necessity will not justify a man in taking another's life to save his own where there was no fault on the part of such other in producing the necessity.[9]

B SELF-DEFENSE

A homicide committed in legitimate and necessary self-defense is excusable or justifiable, and the slayer is innocent of any crime. Killing in self-defense is not limited to unintentional killings; it is consistent with, and according to some authorities limited to, intentional killings.

The right of self-defense extends to the killing of an assailant where the circumstances are such as excuse or justify resort to such an extreme measure.[10] This right is founded on the law of nature,[11] it is not derived from,[12] and is not, nor can be, superseded by[13] any law of society. All that the law attempts to do on the subject is to prescribe rules of caution and prudence to be observed by persons exercising the right.[14] These rules are often incorporated in statutes,[15] some of which establish more liberal rules than those obtaining at common law.[16] The right of self-defense is distinguishable from the right of redress. A person may prevent an injury from being done by all proper means, but, when done, he cannot take redress into his own hands.[17]

Homicide in self-defense is either justifiable[18] or excusable.[19] Justifiable homicide in self-defense occurs where a person without any fault on his part in bringing on the contest or struggle kills another under at least an apparent necessity, in order to save himself from death or great bodily harm.[20]

Statutory definitions of justifiable homicide include the killing of a human being in self-defense;[21] in necessary self-defense,[22] in defense of person against one who manifestly intends or endeavors, by violence or surprise, to commit a felony thereon,[23] in the lawful defense of the slayer, when there was reasonable ground to apprehend a design on the part of the person slain to commit a felony or to do some great personal injury to the slayer and there was imminent danger of such design being accomplished,[24] or in the actual resistance of an attempt to commit murder or a felony on the slayer.[25] Excusable homicide in self-defense occurs where a person, in the course of a sudden affray or combat in which he has become engaged with another, necessarily or under a reasonable apprehension of danger kills the other to save himself from death or great bodily harm.[26] Homicide in self-defense is defined in similar terms.[27] According to some authorities, fault or freedom from fault on the part of accused in bringing on the difficulty determines whether a homicide in self-defense is excusable or justifiable, if accused was without fault the homicide may be justifiable, but if he was originally at fault but abandoned the conflict and retreated as far as he safely could, the homicide may be excusable but it cannot be justifiable.[28]

Elements generally The various elements of self-defense, together with their limitations and qualifications, are discussed in detail in ensuing sections, but it may be stated here that a number of authorities, in enumerating the elements of self-defense, have referred to the following: (1) The absence of aggression or provocation on the part of the slayer in provoking or continuing the difficulty. (2) The actual and honest belief of the slayer that he was in imminent danger of death, great bodily harm, or some felony, and that there was a necessity to kill in order to save himself therefrom. (3) The existence of reasonable grounds for such belief. (4) The duty of the slayer to retreat or avoid the danger.[29] The acts which accused may do and justify under a plea of self-defense depend primarily on his own conduct and secondarily on the conduct of deceased.[30] If it appears that accused did not provoke the difficulty and was without fault, and that he performed his duty, under the circumstances, to resort to all available means of avoiding the danger, it then remains to determine from all the circumstances whether the conduct of deceased preceding and at the time of the killing was sufficient to justify accused in an honest belief as a reasonable man that he was in imminent danger of death or great bodily harm.[31] The elements are the same as applied to manslaughter in the first degree and to murder in either degree,[32] and the law of self-defense has been said to be the same in both civil and criminal cases, except in so far as it was affected in the latter by the doctrine of reasonable doubt.[33] In the application of the doctrine of self-defense, the courts should not so construe its requirements as, on the one hand, to work hardships on defendants, or, on the other hand, to bring the doctrine into disrepute or ridicule by reasonable men [34]

Effect on guilt of accused Where a homicide has been committed in legitimate and necessary self-defense, the slayer is entitled to an acquittal[35] and to exemption from criminal liability [36] He is deemed to be innocent and guiltless of any crime [37] In some jurisdictions, self-defense sufficient to exonerate accused completely is referred to as perfect self-defense, as distinguished from imperfect self-defense which exists where the circumstances do not warrant acquittal of all crime, but do justify reduction in the degree of offense of which accused may be found guilty [38]

Nature and propriety of plea Although there is authority to the effect that self-defense is not a special plea, and that a plea of self-defense does not admit that accused did the killing,[39] it has also been held that self-defense is an affirmative defense,[40] and is a plea in the nature of a confession and avoidance [41] The more generally held view is that a plea of self-defense does not traverse the averment of doing the act charged, but confesses and seeks to justify doing the act as legal and avoid any evil consequences from having done it because of having acted in self-defense [42] The plea of self-defense is consistent with an intent to kill[43] or disable [44] Indeed, killing in self-defense has been described as an affirmative, intentional act,[45] and some courts even hold that self-defense is limited to cases of intentional killing,[46] or at least is not ordinarily applicable in the case of a killing resulting from an act which was accidental and unintentional [47] At any rate it is not limited to cases of accidental or unintentional homicides [48] It has also been held that a plea of self-defense is not inconsistent with a killing on provocation in a heat of passion [49]

§ 115. Necessity and Good Faith Basis of Right

In order to justify or excuse a homicide as in self-defense, there must have been a real or apparent necessity for the killing of the assailant or for the use of the measures that resulted in his death

ciple of self-defense is without application and cannot properly be invoked.[51] There must be a necessity,[52] real or apparent,[53] for the killing of the assailant or for the employment of the measure which resulted in his death As some courts have expressed it, the right to kill in self-defense begins where the necessity begins and ends where the necessity ends[54] It has been said that the necessity to kill is deemed to exist when an innocent person is placed in sudden jeopardy[55]

The law of self-defense is available only to those who act honestly and in good faith;[56] it cannot be employed as a shield for the protection of one clearly guilty of murder[57] It does not imply the right to attack,[58] nor will it condone acts done for purposes of retaliation, revenge, or redress.[59] A person may not kill another with malice and premeditation and yet do so in self-defense so as to be acquitted of all criminality[60] The mere fact that accused was drunk or had been drinking does not affect his right of self-defense,[61] even though the necessity for the exercise of the right might not have arisen had there been no drinking[62]

§ 116. Manslaughter Distinguished

Although it is sometimes difficult to draw an exact line between homicide in self-defense and manslaughter, the law distinguishes between the two.

On the facts of the immediate case it is sometimes difficult to draw the exact line between homicide in self-defense and manslaughter [63] Nevertheless the law distinguishes between the two,[64] and a statute stating the elements of manslaughter is inapplicable to a plea of self-defense [65] Conversely, self-defense has no place in a definition of manslaughter or any other degree of homicide as it excuses, rather than fixes the degree of, the homicide and entitles accused to a full acquittal [66]

§ 117. Aggression or Provocation by Accused in General

In order to invoke the right of self-defense, the slayer must have been reasonably free, or, as some authorities hold, entirely free, from fault in provoking or continuing the difficulty which resulted in the killing.

It is well established that one who was the aggressor or provoked the difficulty in which he killed his assailant cannot invoke the right of self-defense to justify or excuse the homicide,[67] unless, as considered infra § 121, he in good faith withdrew from the combat in such a manner as to have shown his adversary his intention in good faith to desist It is not enough to justify or excuse the homicide that in the course of the difficulty it became necessary for accused to kill deceased in order to save his own life or prevent great bodily harm, but he must also have been free from fault in provoking or continuing the difficulty which resulted in the killing [68] Accused cannot avail himself of, or shield himself

Distinctions stated
(1) "Voluntary manslaughter" differs from "homicide" which is excusable because "committed in self defense' in that in the former there is no necessity to kill and in the latter there is an apparent necessity to kill the aggressor for self-preservation—Smith v State App, 11 So 2d 466, reversed on other grounds 11 So 2d 471 243 Ala 254, and certiorari denied 11 So 2d 473, 243 Ala 627

(2) Distinction between "self-defense" and "manslaughter" committed in heat of passion brought on by adequate provocation, lies in existence of reasonably founded belief of imminent peril to life or great bodily harm, as distinguished from influence of uncontrollable fear or terror conceivable as existing but not reasonably justified by immediate circumstances—People v Best, 57 P 2d 168, 13 Cal App 2d 606

on the ground of, a necessity which he has brought on by his own fault or wrongful act[69] The rule applies to one who interferes in a difficulty between others,[70] except where he interferes to prevent the commission of a felony[71] Also, the rule applies where accused provoked the difficulty, even though deceased voluntarily engaged therein[72] The rule does not, however, prevent accused from relying on self-defense where the evidence on the question of aggression or provocation is irreconcilably in conflict[73]

Entire or partial freedom from fault In at least one jurisdiction the rule that freedom from fault on the part of accused in provoking the difficulty which resulted in the killing is necessary to justify or excuse the homicide is vigorously enforced without qualification[74] Under this stringent rule, it is essential, in order to entitle accused to invoke the doctrine of self-defense, that he shall be wholly free from fault in provoking the difficulty,[75] and not merely reasonably so[76] Where, by word or deed, accused voluntarily contributes to the bringing on of the difficulty, he cannot invoke the doctrine of self-defense[77] Actual provocation of the difficulty is sufficient to render accused the aggressor, it is not necessary that his words or acts justify resentment by a man of ordinary self-control[78] In other jurisdictions, however, it is necessary and sufficient that accused shall be reasonably free from fault,[79] it is not required that he shall be entirely free from blame or wrong in order to be entitled to a perfect right of self-defense[80] In these jurisdictions, it is held that the fault must have been such as might reasonably have been calculated to bring on and precipitate a dangerous assault by deceased[81]

§ 118. Nature and Circumstances of Aggression or Provocation

The determination of what conduct constitutes agression or provocation, so as to deprive the slayer of the right of self-defense, depends on the nature and quality of the conduct and the surrounding circumstances

The question of what conduct constitutes provocation, so as to deprive accused of the right of self-defense is one about which there is some uncertainty, if not confusion.[82] It is generally agreed that not every act by the slayer which produced a difficulty, in the course of which a necessity to kill another arose, will preclude the slayer from availing himself of the right of self-defense.[83] Whether or not the act has such effect depends on its character and quality[84] viewed in the light of the prior relations between the parties, if any,[85] and, as considered infra § 120, in some jurisdictions also on the intent with which the difficulty was brought on

§ 119. —— Acts or Words

a. In general
b Particular acts or words

a. In General

As a general rule, any conduct of accused which is reasonably calculated to lead to an affray or deadly conflict and which provokes the difficulty is such aggression as deprives him of the right of self-defense

As a general rule any wrongful or unlawful act[86] or insulting or opprobrious language[87] of accused, which is reasonably calculated to lead to an affray or deadly conflict, and which provokes the difficulty, is such aggression or provocation as deprives him of the right of self-defense Accused must be mindful of his words, acts, or conduct which might be likely to produce a deadly combat[88] If by his acts, words, or conduct he showed a willingness to enter the conflict, or if by his words or acts he invited it, he must be held to have produced the necessity for slaying his adversary, and cannot invoke the doctrine of self-defense[89] The provoking acts of accused need not have been such as would have created a right of self-defense on the part of deceased[90]

Some courts hold that any act intentionally done or word intentionally spoken which, under the circumstances, and in the light of accused's knowledge thereof, has a tendency to provoke a difficulty is wrongful within the meaning of the rule, even though ordinarily such act or word would not be wrongful or offensive[91] Other courts hold that a person may bring on a difficulty, which results in a homicide, without forfeiting the right of self-defense, even if the act by which it was brought on was wrongful,[92] that in order to estop accused to plead self-defense, the difficulty must have been brought about by him unlawfully,[93] that there must have been acts, words, or conduct on his part reasonably calculated to provoke the difficulty,[94] and uttered or performed willingly and knowingly,[95] although there is some authority to the effect that, where the conduct was intended to provoke and did provoke a difficulty, the question of whether it was reasonably calculated for such purpose is not a practical one.[96]

The act of provocation must have been committed at the time the homicide occurred,[97] and must have related to[98] or provoked[99] the assault in the resistance of which the assailant was killed. A person is not deprived of the right of self-defense solely because he may have been guilty in the past of some wrongful act,[1] or by reason of the fact that he may have had prior difficulties with deceased,[2] or by the fact that he may have been under a bond to keep the peace.[3]

Accused is not deprived of the right to defend himself, as distinguished from the right to defend another person, by the fact that such other person may have precipitated the difficulty.[4]

b. Particular Acts or Words

The general principles as to what conduct constitutes aggression or provocation on the part of accused so as to deprive him of the right of self-defense have been applied to particular acts or words

In the application of the principles considered supra subdivision a of this section, various particular matters have been held to constitute,[5] or not to constitute,[6] such fault, provocation, or aggression as to preclude accused from setting up self-defense.

Abusive or insulting language Some courts hold that mere words, however abusive or opprobrious, do not amount to such provocation as will preclude the person speaking them from killing in self-defense,[7] unless, in accordance with the rule considered infra § 120, he used that means of bringing on the difficulty for the purpose of affording him an opportunity to kill deceased or to do him great bodily harm.[8] Other courts, however, recognize the rule that the provocation may rest in the mere use of insulting or opprobrious words,[9] and it will be observed throughout this section that the rules as to what does or does not constitute a provocation of the difficulty are generally so stated as to include words as well as acts. Insulting or offensive words springing naturally from accused in a sudden quarrel,[10] or employed by accused after the difficulty has begun,[11] or prior threats by accused,[12] will not in themselves deprive him of the right of self-defense.

Looks or gestures In at least one jurisdiction, it has been said, in discussions of provocation as depriving accused of his right of self-defense, that no looks or gestures, however insulting, can amount in law to a provocation sufficient to justify an assault.[13] Glaring at deceased, with whom accused had had a previous altercation, has been held not to constitute such provocation as to deprive the latter of the right of self-defense.[14] is the aggressor where he commences an assault[15] or commits a battery[16] on another person. He may also be guilty of such provocation as to deprive him of the benefit of self-defense if he caused, provoked, or invited deceased to assault or strike him, or to threaten to do so,[17] as where he made a threatening gesture toward deceased,[18] and this is true, even though accused did not strike the first blow[19] or fire the first shot.[20] Conversely, accused does not forfeit his right of self-defense merely because he strikes the first blow or fires the first shot where deceased provokes the difficulty.[21] Under some statutes a distinction is drawn between beginning a difficulty and provoking it.[22]

Commission of crime. Accused is not deprived of his right to claim self-defense merely by reason of his having been engaged in the commission of an offense at the time of the killing,[23] but a person who, while in the actual perpetration of a felony, by violence, kills another person attempting to prevent the felony, cannot plead self-defense.[24] Self-defense does not excuse a homicide committed by accused while engaged in committing robbery,[25] burglary,[26] or kidnapping.[27] However, it is not true that a person who is being pursued as a thief is not justified under any circumstances in protecting himself from any attack his pursuers may make on him.[28]

Trespass or resistance thereof. A mere trespass on the property of another is not such an act of aggression or provocation as will preclude the trespasser from killing in self-defense,[29] but the rule is otherwise where the trespass was made with the intent and purpose of bringing on a difficulty,[30] or with knowledge that it would provoke a violent conflict with the owner,[31] or where it was such as would reasonably be calculated to precipitate a conflict,[32] or where it was made in a violent, menacing, or aggressive manner, and the force used by the owner was no more than was necessary to eject the trespasser,[33] particularly, in any of these situations, where the trespasser came armed with a deadly weapon[34] which he intended to use if necessary.[35] Refusal of accused to leave the habitation of deceased, so that he became a trespasser who could be ejected by whatever force that might be necessary,[36] even to the taking of his life,[37] deprives accused, as trespasser, of the right to kill in defending himself against the force which was used to eject him Resisting a trespasser is not an act of aggression, so as to deprive one of the right of self-defense,[38] unless the resistance used is excessive and not warranted by the force used by the trespasser[39]

Carrying arms. The act of accused in arming himself may be a significant factor, when taken in connection with other facts, in leading to the determination that he provoked the difficulty which resulted in the killing[40] Thus, it has been held that the mere fact that accused arms himself after deceased arrives at the scene of the homicide may have a tendency to provoke a deadly combat[41] However, the mere fact that accused had a dangerous weapon and used it does not take away the right of self-defense if without that fact the right would have existed,[42] and the fact that a person is carrying a weapon unlawfully does not deprive him of the right to use it in his necessary self-defense[43] A person who arms himself, not for purposes of aggression, but in anticipation of a possible attack and for the sole purpose of necessary self-defense, may exercise the right of self-defense where he does nothing else or nothing wrongful to provoke or bring on a difficulty[44]

Criminal intercourse with wife or daughter of another According to some authorities, sexual intercourse with the wife of another is a wrong so obviously calculated to bring on a difficulty with the husband, that if the paramour, when caught in the act or just after it was over, killed the husband in order to save himself from death or great bodily harm, he could not invoke the doctrine of self-defense as a justification or excuse,[45] except where the husband attempted to kill him in vengeance for past wrongs, as where, knowing of his wife's infidelity, he deliberately lays a trap for her paramour in order to kill him if caught in the act[46] However, it is held in some jurisdictions that illicit intercourse with the wife of another is not alone such a provocation or bringing on of a difficulty as to deprive the paramour of the right of self-defense[47] The right of self-defense is not forfeited by the fact that some time prior to the homicide accused had intercourse with the wife of deceased[48] Engaging in illicit sexual intercourse with the daughter of deceased was a wrongful act reasonably calculated to provoke an attack by deceased and therefore deprives accused of the right of self-defense, where he was found in such intercourse at the time of the homicide,[49] but not where it occurred some time prior thereto[50]

It has been held that the doctrine as to aggression with respect generally to the doctrine of self-defense should be relaxed where a husband kills his wife or her paramour in self-defense in a struggle ensuing from his attack on her and her paramour in, or immediately after, the act of adultery,[51] but where the husband, armed with a deadly weapon, breaks into the house or apartment of the paramour, while the latter was asleep, under circumstances sufficient to cause on the part of the paramour a reasonable apprehension of death or great bodily harm, the husband is the aggressor and precluded from setting up self-defense.[52]

Exercise of legal right The exercise of a legal right in a lawful manner does not ordinarily constitute such an act of provocation as will deprive the person exercising it of his right of self-defense,[53] although, having reason to believe that it might result in a struggle or conflict, he armed or otherwise prepared himself accordingly,[54] or, although by exercising such right, he put himself in the way of being attacked,[55] or even though he did strike the first blow, if this was necessary to secure his personal safety.[56] A person who has been threatened with loss of life or serious bodily injury may nevertheless go where he has a right to be,[57] he is not obliged to remain at home in order to avoid a meeting with, or assault by, his adversary but may arm himself and pursue his legitimate business or vocation without thereby losing his right of self-defense.[58] However, he has not the right to lie in wait for and slay his adversary,[59] or, as considered infra § 120, to seek or hunt him with the intention of killing or seriously injuring him. A person may not arm himself and renew a conflict in a public street, and then attempt to assert in his defense that deceased was interfering with his right to walk the street.[60]

Although there is authority for the view that a person who brings on a difficulty may be deprived of his right of self-defense even though he has no specific intent to bring on the difficulty, it is generally held that accused does not lose his right of self-defense unless his conduct was intended or calculated to bring on the difficulty.

As a general rule, accused is not deprived of the right of self-defense on the ground of provocation of the difficulty unless he intends to provoke the difficulty,[61] even though his acts and words may be of such a nature as to provoke a difficulty and do in fact have that effect.[62] The test is said to be whether the acts or language of accused are intended or calculated to bring on a difficulty, if they are not, his right of self-defense is not lost.[63] However, a mere intent and design by accused to provoke a difficulty does not deprive him of his right of self-defense if he makes no overt act to provoke it.[64] In a jurisdiction where accused is required to be entirely free from fault in provoking or bringing on the difficulty in order to set up self-defense, as considered supra § 117, it is held that accused may be at fault within the meaning of the rule, even though he has no specific intent to bring on the difficulty.[65] Of course, self-defense is not available to one who conducts himself so as to provoke a deadly combat, with intent or design to accomplish this end.[66] While the belief of accused that he is in a place where he has a right to be does not establish the right of self-defense, it tends to rebut his bad faith in bringing on the conflict.[67]

or brings on a difficulty whether by words or other means, for the purpose of obtaining an opportunity, pretext, or excuse to kill another or inflict great bodily harm on him or to wreak malice on him, he cannot justify or excuse the homicide on the ground of self-defense, however necessary the killing to save himself from death or great bodily harm.[68] Where a wrongful or unlawful act, reasonably calculated to lead to an affray or deadly conflict, is committed by accused with the intent to kill if such a conflict should arise, he is more clearly guilty of aggression or provocation so as to deprive him of the right of self-defense than if his act were not accompanied by such intent.[69] However, the right of self-defense will not be impaired by the fact that accused has malice against deceased or that there is a mere intention or preparation to kill deceased or inflict great bodily harm on him, unaccompanied by overt acts indicative of the wrongful purpose, and calculated to provoke the difficulty.[70] In some jurisdictions, to preclude an aggressor entirely from the right of self-defense, he must have provoked the difficulty with a felonious intent, that is, with an intent of killing deceased or inflicting great bodily harm on him.[71] In these jurisdictions if he provokes the difficulty with any intent other than felonious, as where he intends only an ordinary battery, he has what is called an imperfect right of self-defense, that is, he is not entirely justified or excused in killing to save himself from death or great bodily harm, but the homicide is reduced to some grade less than murder, such as manslaughter.[72]

In seeking deceased Accused cannot claim self-defense where he seeks deceased for the purpose of provoking or bringing on a difficulty in which he may kill or inflict great bodily injury,[73] and where, on meeting deceased, he executes his purpose by provoking a difficulty with him.[74] Self-defense cannot be invoked by a person who arms himself and seeks or hunts his adversary for the purpose of killing him[75] or inflicting on him great bodily harm,[76] or with the intent of provoking a difficulty or having an affray,[77] and, on meeting him, provokes or brings on a difficulty,[78] and in such case it is immaterial whether accused or deceased provoked the difficulty or was the aggressor immediately before the homicide.[79] The same rule has been applied to one who, while armed in accordance with his custom, formed the intent to seek out and provoke a difficulty with deceased and to overcome any opposition by using his weapon.[80] The fact that threats against the life of accused have been made by deceased and communicated to accused does not give the latter the right to seek out deceased with intent to engage in a mortal com-

However, it has also been held that a person who arms himself and provokes a difficulty does not necessarily lose his right of self-defense unless the purpose to provoke a difficulty and to overcome opposition exists at the time of arming.—Coleman v. State, 176 So. 714, 179 Miss. 661.

bat.[81] However, the fact that accused sought deceased with the intention of provoking a difficulty does not forfeit his right of self-defense, unless, after finding deceased, he did some act or uttered some word calculated to provoke a difficulty.[82] This is true, even though, in seeking deceased with the intention of provoking a difficulty, accused goes armed with a deadly weapon.[83] Likewise, although accused arms himself and seeks deceased with the intent to kill him, yet his right of self-defense is perfect where, on meeting deceased and before making any effort to carry out his intention, he is attacked by deceased.[84]

One may seek another against whom he has a grievance, and the fact that he arms himself is not necessarily a provocation placing him in the wrong.[85] Thus accused's right of self-defense is not forfeited by his having sought a meeting with deceased in a lawful and peaceable manner, not with the intention of provoking a difficulty but for a lawful purpose, such as to obtain a peaceable adjustment of differences or an explanation of language or conduct on the part of deceased which affects accused, his wife, or daughter,[86] nor is accused's right of self-defense affected by the fact that in seeking a meeting in such a manner and for such a purpose, he went armed in order to protect and defend himself against any attack which might be made on him.[87] However, a lawful or peaceable intention on the part of accused in approaching deceased will not excuse an unlawful homicide resulting from violence after they came together. The mere manner in which accused invited deceased to a particular place will not suffice to relieve him of fault in bringing on the difficulty if in fact his purpose was to kill deceased with a greater degree of safety in such place.[88] The act of accused in going to the place where deceased was, on the invitation and call of deceased, did not eliminate his right of self-defense when attacked by deceased,[89] even though, in complying with the invitation, he went armed.[90] Where the parties met otherwise than by the design and contrivance of accused, as by accident, accused is not necessarily guilty because he commenced the conflict.[91]

§ 121. Withdrawal after Aggression

One who has provoked a difficulty may nevertheless regain his right of self-defense by attempting to withdraw from it in good faith and in some manner advising his adversary of his intention to do so.

Where one who has provoked a combat abandons or withdraws from it in good faith, and not merely for the purpose of gaining advantage, and by his conduct clearly shows his desire to decline any further struggle, his right of self-defense is restored, and if thereafter he is pursued by his adversary, he is justified or excused in killing him if necessary to save himself from death or great bodily harm,[92] although the whole transaction consists of but one combat or assault.[93] In order that the right of self-

Withdrawal from mutual combat see infra § 122

A real or apparent necessity for killing must be present after accused's withdrawal in order to restore his right of self-defense—McClusky v State, 96 So 9.5, 209 Ala. 611

After defending relative
If one enters a conflict to defend a relative and afterwards abandons his plan to defend such relative and himself withdraws in good faith from such conflict and is thereafter pursued, his right to defend himself from the latter attack is complete, although the relative to whose aid he first entered the conflict had not withdrawn therefrom—Moore v State, 218 P 1102, 25 Okl Cr 118 defense may be restored to a person who has provoked or commenced a combat, he must attempt in good faith to withdraw from the combat.[94] He must also in some manner make known his intention to his adversary,[95] and if the circumstances are such that he cannot notify his adversary,[96] as where the injuries inflicted by him are such as to deprive his adversary of his capacity to receive impressions concerning his assailant's design and endeavor to cease further combat,[97] it is the assailant's fault and he must bear the consequences. As long as a person keeps his gun in his hand prepared to shoot, the person opposing him is not expected or required to accept any act or statement as indicative of an intent to discontinue the assault.[98] Where the withdrawal is for the purpose of gaining some new advantage, or is merely colorable, the right of self-defense is not restored.[99] There has been said to be a wide difference between a withdrawal and a mere retreat,[1] the former being an abandonment of the struggle by one of the persons, while the latter may be and often is a continuance of hostilities.[2] In some jurisdictions it is held that withdrawal or retreat after aggression or fault renders a homicide committed in self-defense excusable although not justifiable.[3]

§ 122. Voluntary Participation in Mutual Combat

One who voluntarily participates in a mutual combat for purposes other than protection forfeits his right of self-defense unless, before the homicide is committed, he withdraws and endeavors to decline further combat, and makes that fact known to his adversary.

The principle which controls in cases of provoking a difficulty, see supra § 117, largely controls the doctrine of mutual combat.[4] Where a person voluntarily participates in a contest or mutual combat for purposes other than protection, he cannot justify or excuse the killing of his adversary in the course of such conflict on the ground of self-defense,[5] regardless of what extremity or imminent peril he may be reduced to in the progress of the combat,[6] unless, before the homicide is committed, he withdraws and endeavors in good faith to decline further conflict,[7] and, either by word or act, makes that fact known to his adversary,[8] or unless the combat is entered into through mistake, as in the case of two persons taking each other for burglars.[9] In addition to withdrawal or attempted withdrawal and notification of his adversary, the person must honestly and reasonably believe that he is in danger of death or great bodily harm,[10] and some statutes go even further and require that there be a real and absolute necessity for taking the life of the adversary in order to save the life of the slayer.[11] Some authorities have held that the mere fact that accused intended[12] or that the parties agreed[13] to engage only in a fist fight did not give accused the right to kill in self-defense, without first endeavoring to withdraw, when deceased attacked him with a deadly weapon. However, there is also authority for the view that the intent and purpose of one person in mutually agreeing with another to settle a difficulty determines whether he is deprived of the right of self-defense. If he intends to settle the difficulty with dangerous or deadly weapons and engages in a mutual combat with such intention, he cannot successfully invoke the law of self-defense, but where he willingly enters into a mutual combat with another without any intent to do great bodily harm, and thereupon such other person resorts to a deadly weapon and is about to assault him therewith, he has a right to defend himself and to resort to a deadly weapon in his necessary self-defense.[14] At any rate when persons engage in a mutual combat under an agreement to have a fist fight, but one intends to use a deadly weapon and pursuant to such intention shoots and kills the other, the killing cannot be justified on the ground of self-defense.[15] In some states the rule is stated to be that a person voluntarily entering into a difficulty is entirely deprived of his right of self-defense when, and only when, he does so with some unlawful purpose, such as wreaking or gratifying malice, or taking life or doing great bodily harm.[16] Voluntary participation in a mutual combat has been held to give rise to an imperfect right of self-defense.[17]

What constitutes mutual combat. The expression "mutual combat" is practically self explanatory.[18] It is essential to constitute a mutual combat that there be a mutual intent to fight,[19] but there need not be mutual blows.[20] It is sufficient if there is a mutual intent to fight and one or more blows are struck,[21] and it is immaterial who strikes the first blow or fires the first shot.[22] The mutual intent to fight may be manifested by the acts and conduct of the persons and the circumstances surrounding them at the time of the combat, as well as the circumstances leading up to, and culminating in, the combat.[23]

Voluntary self-defense distinguished. A person does not under all circumstances forfeit his right of self-defense merely because he voluntarily and willingly engages in a fight or difficulty.[24] While it is sometimes stated generally that to be entitled to set up self-defense as a justification or excuse, one must not willingly enter into a fight,[25] difficulty,[26] or combat with deadly weapons,[27] such statements have been said to mean that he must not fight willingly to gratify his desire to fight[28] or at all, unless the elements of self-defense are present[29] Where, however, these elements are present, and one fights exclusively in his own defense, without employing excessive force, he should be acquitted even though he fights and defends himself "willingly" or "voluntarily"[30] In the sense that it is an affirmative, intentional act, as discussed supra § 114, self-defense is voluntary[31] In a very genuine sense, a person defending his life and limb does so willingly, but he does so rightfully[32] Considered from another point of view, a person is properly said to fight willingly where, although there is an impending peril to his life or person from an assault being made upon him, yet he chooses to enter into the fight when with safety to himself he might have avoided the peril without fighting,[33] and he cannot properly be said to enter willingly into a fight when his participation in it is under the compulsion of a necessity of defending himself, not occasioned or brought about by any fault on his part[34]

a. Nature

In order to justify or excuse a homicide in self-defense, the accused must be in danger, real or apparent, of loss of life or of some great bodily harm.

Words and phrases, such as "great personal injury," "serious bodily injury" or "great bodily injury," used in the statutes and rules relating to self-defense in homicide cases, define themselves,[35] they are used in their ordinary sense in common acceptance among the people[36] A person is not justified or excused in taking life in all cases where he fears or apprehends that he will be harmed or injured regardless of the extent of the harm or injury apprehended[37] In order to justify or excuse the homicide, accused must be in danger, real or apparent, of loss of life or of some great bodily harm,[38] it is not required that the danger shall be of "enormous"[39] or "the most serious"[40] bodily harm Also the danger need not be that of loss of life, a person has as much right to protect himself against great bodily harm or serious bodily injury[41] or a felony upon the person[42] as he has against the taking of life The expression "serious bodily injury," sometimes employed in statutes and decisions instead of "great bodily harm," is deemed equivalent in meaning to the latter term[43] Also the term "great personal injury" is understood as equivalent in import to "great bodily harm"[44] A homicide is not justifiable or excusable on the ground of self-defense by reason of a danger, or apprehension of danger, of general bodily injury,[45] or of a mere indignity,[46] or of a slight or moderate injury,[47] such as that to be apprehended from a mere trespass[48] or a simple or ordinary assault or battery[49] with the hand or fist without a weapon,[50] unless the assault or trespass is accompanied by acts indicating imminent danger of great bodily harm or felony and produces in the mind of accused a reasonable belief of such danger[51] This is true although the peril could not be escaped by retreat or the danger would have been thereby increased[52] However, it is not true, without modification or qualification, that the great bodily harm which the law contemplates never can be, under any circumstances, such as may be inflicted by mere blows with the hands or feet[53] There may be cases in which, by reason of the great disparity in age or strength between the persons or the ferocity of the attack, the intended beating may be of such a character as to justify the assaulted person in killing[54] A number of courts hold that the attack on accused must be of a manifestly or apparently felonious nature to justify or excuse him in taking life in self-defense,[55] and that it is not justifiable to kill an assailant who apparently intends to commit a misdemeanor only[56] Some courts, however, hold that a person is justified in taking life if necessary to protect himself against great bodily harm, even though the attack upon him is not a felony,[57] and, under a statute so providing, homicide in self-defense against a nonfelonious assault is justifiable if the attack is unlawful and violent[58] The foregoing rules should not be taken to mean that the right of self-defense generally, as distinguished from the right in homicide cases, exists only where there is real or apparent danger of death or serious bodily injury, they mean only that such real or apparent danger must exist to constitute a justification or excuse for the taking of life as distinguished from the use of such force as would otherwise constitute a simple or aggravated assault[59]

b. Imminence

In order to justify or excuse the taking of human life in self-defense, the danger or peril of loss of life or the infliction of serious bodily harm must be, or appear to be, impending and imminent, the danger must be either actual, present, and urgent, or such as the slayer believes on reasonable grounds to be so urgent and pressing that it is necessary for him to kill in order to save himself from immediate death or great bodily harm[60] A mere fear or belief on the part of accused that he will suffer great bodily harm or loss of life in the future, as distinguished from the present, does not constitute a justification or excuse,[61] nor is a past danger or apprehension sufficient[62] However, accused is entitled to act as long as, from his standpoint, the danger is imminent, even though the act which demonstrates the imminence of danger has transpired[63] The danger need not appear to be urgent and pressing as a logical sequence of reasoning in conformity to normal standards.[64] Under a statute justifying homicide in self-defense against a nonfelonious attack, the killing is justified only if it occurs while the person killed is in the very act of making the attack, it is not justified if the person killed was only about to attack or was doing some act preparatory to the attack,[65] although the person attacked is not required even under this rule to wait until a battery has been inflicted upon him[66]

§ 124. Apprehension of Danger

As a general rule a person under an honest and reasonable apprehension of death or great bodily harm may kill his adversary in self-defense if the other elements of self-defense are present

It is well settled as a general rule that a person under an honest and reasonable apprehension of death or great bodily harm may kill his adversary in self-defense if the other elements of self-defense are present[67]

§ 125. —— Real or Apparent Danger Generally

In order to justify or excuse a homicide in self-defense there need not be a real or actual danger, if the appearances are such as to warrant a reasonable belief that there is real and imminent danger, the accused may be justified or excused for killing although it later develops that there was no real danger.

The danger which justifies killing in self-defense, see supra § 123, must be real or apparent[68] While a person may kill in his defense when there is actual danger making the killing necessary to prevent death or great bodily harm,[69] yet when all the elements necessary and sufficient to constitute an excuse or justification on the ground of apparent danger are present it is immaterial whether the danger is actual or not[70] The slayer need not be in actual danger of death or great bodily harm, he is entitled to act on appearances, and it is sufficient if he believes in good faith and on reasonable grounds that he is in such peril, although it afterward appears that he is mistaken as to the existence or imminence of the danger.[71]

§ 126. —— Belief of Accused

a. In general
b Grounds for belief

a. In General

Even though there is apparent danger, the accused is not justified or excused in killing his adversary unless he entertains an honest and bona fide belief that the danger is real, and acts under the influence of that belief The existence and reasonableness of such belief is to be determined in the light of the circumstances as they appeared to the accused at the time of the homicide.

To justify or excuse a homicide on the ground of apparent peril it is necessary that the slayer shall actually have an honest or bona fide belief that he is in imminent peril of death or great bodily

"Men, when threatened with danger, must determine the necessity of resorting to self-defense, and they will not be held responsible for a mistake in the extent of the actual danger, nor be subject to the peril of making that guilty, if appearances prove false, which would be innocent if they proved true"—Cottrell v Commonwealth, 111 S W 2d 445, 451, 271 Ky 52.

harm or the commission of a felony upon his person, and that in order to save himself from such peril it is necessary to kill,[72] or, as some authorities hold, to use the force which he does use, however dangerous or deadly that force may be[73] The rule is applicable even though the circumstances and surroundings may be apparently dangerous[74] or although there are reasonable grounds to apprehend death or great bodily harm[75] The fact that a statute making homicide justifiable when there is reasonable ground for apprehension of danger does not refer by specific words to any belief or apprehension of danger which may exist in the mind of accused does not obviate the requirement, since it is held that there is not a reasonable ground of apprehension within the meaning of such a statute, unless it is such as actually produces in the mind of accused an honest belief of the existence of the danger which would justify his act of defense[76] Where accused knows that the appearances of danger are deceptive and that he is actually in no danger, he should not be acquitted on the ground that a man of ordinary reason and prudence in the same situation would be deceived by the false appearance of danger[77] While accused may act on appearances, see supra § 125, he must entertain a bona fide belief that he is in actual, and not apparent, peril or danger and that there is a real necessity to kill, in other words, the appearances of danger must be bona fide believed by him to indicate actual peril and a real necessity for taking life[78] A supposition[79] or a probable belief[80] is not the equivalent of the actual and bona fide belief required, and a belief that there is a reasonably apparent necessity to kill is insufficient[81] While the necessity of a belief implies to some extent the exercise of thought,[82] yet, since the circumstances under which an assailed person is called on to defend are often quite unfavorable to mature deliberation, to deny the right to act promptly and decisively and without deliberate thought in such instances would be to deny the right of self-defense[83] However, accused

The right of a person to take life in self-defense arises from his belief in the necessity for it, and his belief and the reasonableness thereof are to be judged in the light of the circumstances as they appeared to him,[85] and not from the circumstances as they appear to others or the belief that others may or might entertain as to the nature and imminence of the danger and the necessity to kill,[86] although, as appears infra subdivision b (1) (b) of this section, there is a lack of harmony among the authorities as to the standard of reasonableness to be applied. Clearly it is not necessary that it appear to the jury or that the jury shall believe that accused was in actual danger of suffering death or great bodily harm from deceased and that there was an actual necessity for the killing.[87] Indeed, it is the duty of the jury to consider the facts from the standpoint of accused and not merely from the standpoint of accused as nearly as they are able to do so.[88]

As basis of action. In order to render a homicide justifiable or excusable on the ground that accused honestly fears or believes that he is in imminent danger of death or great bodily harm and that it is necessary for him to kill to save himself therefrom, it is essential that he act solely under the influence of that fear, belief, or apprehension,[89] and not in a spirit of anger, revenge, or malice,[90] or through mere cowardice.[91] On the other hand, a showing that the killing was not done in a spirit of revenge is not essential to justify a homicide committed in resisting a felonious attack actually being made on accused.[92]

Where actual peril exists. Some authorities hold that the requirement of honest belief is applicable only to a state of reasonably apparent peril,[93] and that where accused was in actual imminent peril of his life or serious bodily harm, and the other con-

Circumstances may justify a claim of self-defense even though accused was not conscious of his actions at the actual instant of killing, and he may claim the benefit of the situation as it reasonably appeared to him up to time when he became unconscious.—Wilker v State 83 P 2d 994, 52 Ariz 180

ditions requisite to the exercise of the right of self-defense were present, his honest belief in such peril is not material and the law will make no inquiry as to its existence.[94] However, it has also been held that a person who deliberately and maliciously kills another cannot successfully interpose the plea of self-defense where, although there is actual danger, he is ignorant thereof at the time and does not entertain any belief or apprehension of danger.[95]

Defense of one's self in one's habitation is subject to the same qualification as to good faith in believing the danger imminent as in other cases.[96]

(1) Reasonableness of Grounds

(a) In general
(b) Standards of reasonableness

(a) In General

To justify or excuse a homicide on the ground of self-defense it is not enough that the accused honestly believes himself to be in danger, but there must be reasonable grounds for such belief

To justify or excuse a homicide on the ground of self-defense it is not enough that the slayer honestly believes himself to be in danger,[97] or that he entertains a bare fear of the commission on his person of those felonies to prevent which homicide may be lawfully committed.[98] There must be some grounds for the belief or fear,[99] the circumstances must be such as to make the belief or apprehension a reasonable one.[1] As frequently stated the rule is that, where the other elements of self-defense are present, it is necessary and sufficient that accused have reasonable grounds or cause to believe or apprehend that another is about to take his life or do him great bodily harm, and that it is necessary to kill to save himself from the impending danger.[2] It is sometimes stated that the belief must be, or is sufficient if it is, well founded,[3] or reasonable and well-founded,[4] or reasonable and well grounded,[5] but it is expressly held that, unless otherwise limited,[6] it is error to require both a reasonable and a well grounded belief, as the former is sufficient and the latter signifies a higher apprehension of danger than the law requires to constitute a justification for a homicide.[7] The belief or conviction required is a "reasonable," rather than a "judicious" one.[8] It is not true that in all cases a person has a right to kill when he has reasonable ground for believing that he is in danger at the time of losing his life or incurring great bodily harm, all the other elements of self-defense must be present.[9] While it is not a condition to the exercise of the right of self-defense in a proper case that deceased have been, or known as, a dangerous man,[10] in determining from the standpoint of accused the reasonableness of his apprehension of danger his knowledge of deceased's propensity to attack persons without cause is an important circumstance.[11]

(b) Standards of Reasonableness

According to most authorities the test whether the accused's belief was reasonable is whether the circumstances would have induced a like belief in a reasonable man, but other authorities hold that the test is whether the circumstances were such as reasonably to induce in the accused, and not in a hypothetical reasonable man, a belief that he was in imminent and grave danger

While, as appears supra subdivision b (1) (a) of this section, it is generally agreed that accused's belief in the nature and imminence of the danger and the necessity of killing must be reasonable, the authorities are not in agreement as to the standard of reasonableness by which his belief is to be measured.

In the majority of jurisdictions, the reasonableness of his belief is not determined from the standpoint of accused, that is to say, it is not to be measured by accused's standard of reasonableness,[12] or by that of a man of the class to which accused belongs, such as a person of accused's age, temperament, intelligence, experience, or physical condition;[13] the test of reasonableness applied is that the circumstances surrounding accused at the time of the killing must be such as would induce a reasonable man,[14] or an ordinarily prudent man,[15] or a reasonably cautious man,[16] or a reasonably prudent man,[17] or a reasonable and prudent man,[18] or an ordinarily reasonable and prudent man,[19] or a reasonably cautious and prudent man,[20] or a reasonably prudent or cautious man,[21] or a reasonably well-disposed man of ordinary prudence[22] so situated honestly to believe that he is in imminent peril and that it is necessary for him to kill in order to save himself from death or great bodily harm The circumstances need not be such as to "convince" a reasonable man similarly situated that he is in danger of losing his life or receiving great bodily injury,[23] the term "induce to suppose" is said to express the right meaning[24] As sometimes stated, generally under statutory provisions, it must appear that the circumstances are such as would excite the fears of a reasonable person,[25] but the codes and statutes do not undertake to define what circumstances shall or shall not be sufficient to excite such fears[26] Some courts hold that the circumstances must be such as to induce or justify the requisite fear or belief on the part of a reasonably or ordinarily courageous man[27] or a person possessed of ordinary firmness[28] and reason,[29] but other courts, while adhering to the majority rule that the belief of a reasonable man is the test to be applied, nevertheless deem it improper to apply the standard of what a reasonably courageous man would have believed and done under the same circumstances[30] A belief in the necessity of killing does not excuse accused where it arises only from his intoxicated condition,[31] neither can accused excuse himself on the theory that under the excitement of the moment he acted with undue haste[32] In the case of actual impending peril, the law makes no inquiry as to the existence of such circumstances as would impress a reasonable man with the honest belief that impending peril exists[33]

The view obtaining in the minority of jurisdictions is that if the circumstances, viewed from the standpoint of accused alone, are sufficient to induce in him an honest and reasonable belief that he is in danger of great bodily harm or loss of life, he is justified or excused in killing[34] In these jurisdictions the circumstances are not to be viewed and judged from the standpoint of, or according to the effect or belief they would produce in the mind of, a hypothetical reasonable man,[35] a prudent person,[36] a reasonably prudent man,[37] a reasonably cautious person,[38] a man of ordinary intelligence and courage,[39] or a man of ordinary prudence, caution, and courage[40] Obviously, where it is only required that the circumstances be such as to induce in accused a reasonable belief in the imminence of the danger and the necessity of killing, it is certainly sufficient if the circumstances are such as to induce such a belief in a reasonably prudent person[41]

Regardless of what standard of reasonableness is applicable, while accused is in the first instance the judge of the appearances of danger,[42] his judgment may not be arbitrary[43] and is not conclusive,[44] since, as appears infra § 344, ultimately the reasonableness of accused's belief or apprehension is to be determined by the jury.

(2) Attack or Demonstration

(a) In general

(b) With or without deadly weapon

(a) In General

While an actual assault or attack is not essential to justify or excuse a homicide in self-defense, there must have been some overt act or hostile demonstration by the deceased inducing the belief in the accused that he was in imminent and grave danger

In order to justify or excuse homicide in self-defense, it is not necessary that deceased shall have made an actual assault or attack on accused, if the circumstances showed or raised a reasonable apprehension that he was about to do so,[45] but it is generally held necessary that he shall have indicated by some overt act or hostile demonstration at the time of the killing a real or apparent intention to kill or inflict great bodily harm on accused and thereby induced the latter to believe on reasonable grounds that he was in imminent danger and that it was necessary to kill to save himself,[46] although it has also been held that, if deceased's conduct induced such a belief, a "pass" or "demonstration" was not required to entitle accused to exercise the right of self-defense[47] What constitutes such an overt act or demonstration depends on the circumstances of each case, no general rule can be laid down[48] The intent of deceased to kill or inflict serious bodily injury may reasonably appear from his acts alone or from his acts coupled with his

It may consist of a motion a gesture, conduct, or demonstration, or anything else reasonably evidencing a present design to take accused's life or to do him great bodily harm—Anderson v State, 179 So 560, 181 Miss 300

Demonstration held sufficient

Accused, testifying that he was put in fear by attitude of deceased, walking toward him with package wrapped in paper, was held not without reasonable ground to believe he was in imminent danger, as matter of law, in view of previous difficulties with and threats by deceased, although latter made no actual assault—State v. Radon, 19 P 2d 177, 45 Wyo. 383.

words, so as to give rise to the right of self-defense;[49] but it has been held that words alone, at least when they are not threatening, do not place the person against whom they are spoken in physical danger.[50] The mere fact that deceased had at hand the means of carrying out an intention to kill or inflict serious bodily injury is no justification or excuse for killing him.[51]

(b) With or without Deadly Weapon

The mere use or nonuse of a deadly weapon in making the assault on, or demonstration against, the accused does not conclusively determine whether the accused's fear of death or great bodily harm was well grounded; all the surrounding circumstances must be considered

Whether an assault or attack with a dangerous or deadly weapon justifies the killing of the assailant depends on the circumstances,[52] it is not, as a matter of law, a justification.[53] However, where a presumption of an intent to kill or inflict serious bodily injury arises from the use of a deadly weapon, see infra § 188, it has been held that, where accused was assaulted by deceased with a deadly weapon, he had the right to believe that deceased intended to kill him.[54] The circumstances attending an attack with a deadly weapon are frequently such as to give accused reasonable ground to believe that he is in danger of death or great bodily harm and that it is necessary to kill to save himself.[55] A person attacked with a deadly weapon may, if he does so honestly and in good faith, rightfully act in the light of his surroundings and on the appearances to him at the time.[56] The mere fact that deceased was carrying a deadly weapon,[57] or made a threatening gesture as though to draw or use one,[58] or even drew[59] or presented[60] one, does not raise the apprehension necessary and sufficient to justify or excuse a killing in self-defense, there must have been other circumstances indicating an intention on the part of deceased to kill or inflict great bodily harm. However, where the circumstances coupled with the act of deceased in drawing or attempting to draw a weapon or making a movement or demonstration as if to draw or procure a weapon were such as to afford reasonable grounds for the belief that he was about to kill or inflict great bodily harm, accused was entitled to defend himself even to taking the life of deceased.[61] In such case, while accused was not entitled to act on the first appearance of danger,[62] he had a right to act promptly on the reasonable appearance of things and to anticipate the action of deceased by firing first, it was not necessary for him to wait until deceased was on equal terms or until he shot or aimed his weapon at accused or presented it in instant readiness for shooting,[63] even though it subsequently appears, in case of a movement or demonstration as though to draw a weapon, that deceased was in fact unarmed.[64] In order to justify a killing in self-defense, it is not true that there must have been used against the slayer what is commonly understood to be of itself a deadly weapon. It is sufficient if he was confronted with such means of force as to induce a reasonable apprehension that he was in danger of loss of life or great bodily harm.[65] It cannot be said that a person who has disarmed his adversary is under no necessity to employ the same weapon against the adversary, where the struggle continues, there is the contingency that accused may in turn be disarmed, and, in view of the nature of a wound received by accused, he may reasonably fear the outcome of a prolonged and continued hand to hand struggle[66] If no deadly weapons are used in the attack the relative strength and size of the persons have a bearing on the reasonableness of the apprehension,[67] but the relative strength and size of the persons does not affect one's right of self-defense where deadly weapons are used[68] Where the persons are of equal size and physical strength, the attack of one, without a deadly weapon, upon the other does not furnish to the latter reasonable ground to anticipate danger to life or the infliction of great bodily harm[69]

Attack with sticks or clubs It is a question of fact whether a person attacked with a stick is justified in considering himself in danger of life or limb[70] Merely raising a stick to strike, although the stick is capable of producing death, does not justify killing the assailant[71]

Attack or demonstration with ax Where deceased, without provocation, assaulted accused with an ax and was close enough to have hit him with it by throwing it at him, and, knowing of the threats of deceased and remembering the previous difficulties, accused had cause to believe that deceased was about to kill him or inflict great bodily harm on him and, so believing, shot and killed deceased, he was justified in so doing on the ground of self-defense,[72] but the mere brandishing of an ax by deceased did not necessarily show that he was about to use it on accused, or that accused had reason to believe that he was in imminent peril.[73]

Attack with calicut. In a case where deceased struck at accused with a calicut, it was held that the character of the weapon was such that accused could not have reasonably believed that it was necessary to kill his assailant in order to repel the attack[74]

(3) Threats

As a general rule mere threats by the deceased do not justify his slaying by the person threatened, but threats accompanied or followed by an overt act or demonstration indicating an intention to execute them and inducing in accused a reasonable belief that he is in imminent and grave danger will justify or excuse the killing of deceased in self defense

While it has been said broadly that a person whose life is threatened and to whom such threats are communicated may take all measures permitted by law for protecting himself thereafter,[75] it is the general rule that threats,[76] or threats and the fear induced thereby,[77] standing alone, afford no excuse or justification for a homicide, they cannot put accused in imminent danger[78] The fact that deceased made threats against accused does not excuse or justify the killing as in self-defense, unless such threats were communicated to accused prior to the killing,[79] were threats of death or great bodily harm[80] to accused,[81] and were followed by some overt act or hostile demonstration indicating an impending purpose, real or apparent, to put them into execution,[82] and inducing an honest[83] belief,[84] based on reasonable grounds,[85] that deceased was about to execute the threats and that accused was in imminent peril of great bodily harm or loss of life The existence of all the elements is essential to justify or excuse the killing, even though the threats were made by a bad, desperate, vicious, or lawless man[86] On the other hand, where all of these elements were present, it is not essential to the exercise of the right of self-defense that deceased have been a dangerous man,[87] or that there have been an actual attack,[88] felonious assault,[89] or attempt to execute the threats[90] on the part of deceased, or that the threats have been seriously made as a matter of fact,[91] or that deceased should actually have intended at the time to execute the threats[92] It is not necessary that the demonstration be coupled with ability to take life, it is necessary and sufficient that the demonstration or attempt be coupled with a real or apparent ability to take life[93] The right of self-defense is not affected by whether accused himself heard the threats or merely heard of them and believed what he heard[94] So, even though threats have not in fact been made, yet, where accused has been informed and believes that they have been made, he is entitled to act on that belief and as though they had in fact been made, the threats should be viewed from his standpoint and not from the standpoint of whether they were or were not actually made[95] Accused had a right to interpret the conduct of deceased in the light of threats made by deceased against him[96] Where the threats of deceased were communicated to accused, the latter was entitled to act more promptly and on less demonstration of hostility than he otherwise would have been[97]

Words, threats, menaces, and contemptuous gestures A plea of self-defense is not sustained where it appears that the slayer took the life of his victim solely because he was provoked by words, threats, menaces, or contemptuous gestures,[98] but words, threats, menaces, or contemptuous gestures may amount to a complete justification under some circumstances, as where they are sufficient to excite the fears of a reasonable man that his life is in immediate danger or that a felony is about to be committed upon him[99]

§ 127. Duty to Retreat or Avoid Danger

As a general rule, in order to justify or excuse a homicide as in self-defense, the accused must have embraced all reasonable means within his power and consistent with his safety, including, according to most authorities, escape or retreat, to avoid the danger The rule, however, is subject to various exceptions and limitations.

Subject to certain exceptions and limitations, considered herein and infra §§ 128-130, it is a general rule that, in order to justify or excuse a homicide as in self-defense, accused must have embraced all reasonable or probable means within his power and consistent with his safety to avoid the danger and avert the necessity of killing, and such means generally are deemed to include escape or retreat from the impending danger[1] Some authorities make it the duty of accused to retreat where he can do so with safety[2] or with reasonable safety[3] Others, however, impose an even greater burden on accused and state the rule to be that a person must retreat rather than take the life of another unless he would thereby increase his peril or it reasonably appears that his peril would be thereby increased[4] Under the latter view, where one can retreat without increasing his peril, it is his duty to do so rather than kill his adversary, even though he cannot retreat with absolute safety to his person;[5] and the fact that retreat will not place him in less peril or on a better vantage ground than before does not excuse him from performing this duty[6]

Under no view is it the law that the right of self-defense does not arise until accused has done everything in his power to avoid the necessity of killing,[7] nor is it necessary that there be an absolute lack of means of escape[8] If none was known or apparent to accused at the time it is sufficient,[9] and where accused, acting on appearances, honestly and reasonably believes that he cannot retreat without increasing his peril, he may justifiably kill in his own defense, even though, as a matter of fact, a retreat would not have endangered his personal safety[10] The question is not whether the jury believes, but whether accused believed and had reasonable grounds to believe, that he had no safe, or apparently safe, means of protecting himself other than the slaying of his adversary[11] Accused is not called on to turn and run the instant he sees his adversary start toward him[12] where it has not yet become reasonably apparent that to avoid great bodily harm he must retreat or take the life of his adversary,[13] where he has no warning that his adversary intends to assault him,[14] or where, although he has knowledge of such intention, he is justified in believing that a third person will prevent the assault[15] Accused is not required to retreat in all cases,[16] his duty to do so may be affected by the nature of the attack upon him, as discussed infra § 129, or by the place of the attack, as discussed infra § 130, or by the fact that he is an officer or person making an arrest, as discussed infra § 137

him of the right of self-defense.[17]

As affected by accused's fault or freedom from fault The rule requiring accused to retreat is especially applicable where he was at fault in getting himself into the dangerous situation.[18] Some courts hold that the rule applies, even though accused was free from fault in bringing about the situation that imperiled his life or limb,[19] but other courts hold that a person who is in the right,[20] or on whom a difficulty is sought to be forced,[21] need not run away or retreat.

As affected by whether homicide is justifiable or excusable Some authorities make the duty to retreat depend on whether the circumstances are such as to render the homicide excusable or justifiable by holding that the duty to retreat exists in the former class of cases but not in the latter.[22]

Authorities denying duty to retreat By express statute in at least one jurisdiction, a person violently and unlawfully assaulted is in no case required to retreat in order to justify the killing of his assailant, although he is required in some instances to resort to all means other than retreat to avoid the necessity of killing his adversary.[23]

Means other than retreat Some courts hold that the aid of the law by peace proceedings should be sought before resorting to violence where such a course can be safely pursued,[24] but there is also authority to the contrary.[25] A person who is assaulted is not bound to call on bystanders to restrain his assailant before he is entitled to make personal resistance.[26]

§ 128. —— Retreat to Wall

Although the ancient common-law doctrine that a person may not kill in self-defense unless he first retreats "to the wall" appears still to obtain in some jurisdictions, the tendency of modern authorities is to qualify it, and some courts have even said that the doctrine is no longer the law.

An ancient common-law rule, frequently spoken of as the doctrine of "retreat to the wall," is that a person is not justified or excused in killing one who attacks him, unless he first retreats as far as he can do so without increasing his real or apparent peril.[27] Where one already has his back to the wall or is about as close to the wall as it is possible for him to be, the requirements of the rule are satisfied and he is not obliged to retreat or escape before taking life in self-defense.[28] The tendency of modern authorities is to qualify, and narrow the application of, the old common-law doctrine of retreating to the wall.[29] Some courts go so far as to say that the old doctrine of retreating to the wall is no longer the law, it having been superseded by the rule that a person who is in a place where he has a right to be may stand his ground and defend himself,[30] or by the rule that the duty of retreat rests on the person who is in the wrong rather than on the one who is in the right.[31] However, it has been said that the doctrine is undoubtedly still a part of the law of a number of jurisdictions,[32] and this would seem to be borne out by the authorities supporting the rule stated supra § 127 that a person must retreat rather than take the life of another unless he would thereby increase or apparently increase his peril. In a few jurisdictions the doctrine is limited to cases in which the persons engage in mutual combat or where accused, being the assailant, does not endeavor in good faith to decline any further struggle, and possibly to other similar cases.[33]

§ 129. —— Nature of Attack

Although there are some dissident authorities, it generally is held that, while there is a duty to retreat rather than kill in the face of a nonfelonious assault, there is no duty to retreat in the face of a felonious assault or a sudden attack fraught with imminent danger to life and limb

One need not retreat where the assault on him is so fierce that he cannot yield a step without manifest danger of loss of life or enormous bodily harm and there is no other way of saving his own life.[34] If a felonious assault is made in such a manner as to render retreat impossible, there is no duty to retreat.[35] The fact that the assailant is known to be blood-thirsty and dangerous does not require accused to retreat more quickly.[36]

Nonfelonious assault. In the case of an ordinary or nonfelonious assault, even with a deadly weapon, the person assaulted is required to withdraw if he can do so, and to retreat as far as consistent with his own safety, before he is justified or excused in killing his assailant.[37] By virtue of express statutory provisions in some states, where an assault made does not threaten or apparently threaten death or serious bodily injury, the person assaulted must resort to all other means reasonably proper and effective for the purpose, except retreat, to protect himself from the injury before killing,[38] and this is true even though the attack is violent.[39] In applying such a statute and determining whether accused could have protected himself by other means than killing, the situation is to be viewed and judged from the standpoint of accused and not in the light of subsequent events.[40]

Felonious assault. In a few jurisdictions the general rule requiring retreat is deemed applicable even where a person is violently and feloniously assaulted and is without fault in having brought on the difficulty.[41] In the majority of jurisdictions it is a rule that a person who is violently and feloniously assaulted, so that he is or reasonably believes himself to be in imminent danger of loss of life or great bodily injury, is under no duty to retreat or to resort to other means to avoid the danger, although he could do so with safety, but may stand his ground and kill his assailant, if necessary or apparently necessary to save himself from death or great bodily harm,[42] except where he is at fault in

Necessity as affected by absence of duty to retreat

In cases of either a "murderous assault with intent to kill," or an "ordinary assault, with deadly weapons," person assaulted can only kill from necessity, but, in the one, he having brought on the difficulty[43] In a jurisdiction in which a person without fault is never required to retreat but is at most required only to resort to means of avoiding the danger other than retreat, in the case of a violent or felonious assault even those other means need not be resorted to,[44] and the same rule has been applied to one attacked in such a manner as to produce in his mind a reasonable fear of death or of serious bodily injury[45] There is authority for the view that this rule is never applicable unless an actual assault is being made with a present purpose to kill and with the present ability, real or apparent, to carry out the felonious purpose[46] In at least one jurisdiction, while it is recognized that, where the assault by one person on another is manifestly felonious and forcible in its nature, the person assaulted is under no duty to retreat,[47] the rule is often stated as applying to cases where the attack is sudden and murderous,[48] where the assailant is armed with a deadly weapon and is in the very act of effecting his murderous purpose on accused,[49] and where all the other elements of self-defense,[50] including freedom from fault on the part of accused,[51] are present While it has been stated that the rule is applicable where the evidence is clear and without conflict or adverse inference,[52] this does not mean that it is applicable only in such instance, but that, where the evidence is clear and without conflict, the rule applies as a matter of law[53]

Sudden attack and imminent danger It has been stated broadly that the right of one when in imminent danger to take life does not depend on whether there is an opportunity to escape, under such circumstances he is not compelled to step aside or to flee[54] In other words, one is not obliged to turn his back on danger which is in fact imminent.[55] More frequently the absence of an opportunity to escape without increasing the danger is made an element of the rule Thus it is said that a person may stand his ground and slay his assailant where the attack is sudden and the danger imminent and to retreat would increase his peril;[56] that he need not retreat where he is suddenly subjected to a felonious assault[57] which gives him no opportunity to retreat,[58] and that, where the peril is great, and the danger to life or limb imminent, and the person is without fault, the law does not require him to increase his danger by putting himself at a disadvantage[59] The rationale of the rule is that events which terminate in a homicide frequently occur with great rapidity,[60] and that the very suddenness of the attack may put accused to the wall[61] A person who is being forcibly and rapidly attacked cannot be required to retain the presence of mind, calmness, and composure necessary to weigh with nicety the question whether some other means short of taking life will answer the purpose,[62] especially where the assailant has previously attacked him with a deadly weapon and without provocation and has threatened to take his life[63]

Although it is denied or qualified by some authorities, it is the rule in many jurisdictions that a person violently and feloniously assaulted when he is without fault and in a place where he has a right to be need not retreat

Regardless of whether it is viewed as superseding or as merely qualifying the common-law doctrine that accused must retreat to the wall, see supra § 128, it is undoubtedly the rule in many jurisdictions that a person who is violently and feloniously assaulted when he is without fault and in a place where he has a right to be need not retreat but may stand his ground, repel force by force, and be justified in killing his assailant in the reasonable exercise of his right of self-defense [64] A qualification sometimes attached to the rule is that the person attacked must warn his assailant to desist from the attack, unless accused is justified in believing that he does not have time to give such warning [65] However, there is authority for the view that, regardless of whether one is or is not in a place where he has a right to be, he is not justified in taking the life of deceased unless he uses all reasonable means in his power and consistent with his safety to avoid the danger and avert the necessity of killing [66] The rule has also been qualified to the extent of holding that accused was not relieved from the general duty of retreating by the fact that he was in a place where he had a right to be where deceased also had a right to be in that place [67] A person who is in the wrong and in a place where he has no right to be does not have a right to stand his ground [68]

Various applications of the above-stated general rule will be specifically considered in the ensuing subdivisions of this section.

b. Public Place or Conveyance

According to some authorities, but not others, a person attacked when he is lawfully on a public highway is not required to retreat.

In some jurisdictions it is held or recognized that a person is not obliged to retreat when he is lawfully on a public highway and therefore is in a place where he has a right to be,[69] but in other jurisdictions he is not relieved from the duty to retreat under the general rule by the fact that the homicide occurs on a public street or highway,[70] or at a public ferry,[71] or while he is a passenger on a street railway,[72] or in a private conveyance on a public street [73] Under the latter rule, the fact that in retreating he will have to leave behind some property belonging to him, such as an animal or a vehicle, does not relieve him of the duty of retreating [74] The fact that the encounter occurs on a public street does not require him to retreat where other circumstances, such as the character of the attack, relieve him of that duty [75]

c. Accused's Premises

A person is not obliged to retreat where, being without fault in bringing on the difficulty, he is assaulted while in his dwelling house, office, or place of business, or on his premises, or at least within the curtilage thereof It is immaterial whether the assailant is an intruder or another lawful occupant of the premises

A person need not retreat or seek to escape, even though he can do so without increasing his danger, but may lawfully resist even to the extent of taking life if necessary, where, being without fault in bringing on the difficulty, he is assaulted while in his own dwelling house,[76] in his office or place of business,[77] or on his premises[78] at or near his dwelling house or, as sometimes said, within the curtilage, or the dooryard, or such space as is customarily occupied by the dwelling house and outbuildings appurtenant thereto.[79] However, the rule is predicated on the absence of aggression or fault on his part in bringing on the difficulty;[80] the doctrine is for defensive, and not offensive, purposes.[81] It has been held that, although a person is not obliged to retreat when in his own home, yet, where he can avoid a difficulty without killing his assailant merely by closing a door, he should do so, as this does not amount to a retreat but is merely taking advantage of a means immediately available for avoiding the difficulty and the taking of human life.[82] There is, however, authority for the contrary view that after a man goes in his own house he is not required to close the door and remain inside, even though if he does so he may not be further molested, when a man is unlawfully assaulted on his own premises he may arm himself and, standing upon his own doorstep, defend himself to the last extremity against all assailants [83]

Attack by intruder or another occupant The rule that a person assailed in his own dwelling is not bound to retreat is the same whether the attack proceeds from some other occupant or from an intruder [84] Where a house, premises, or place of business is jointly occupied, used, and possessed by two persons, as by partners, joint tenants, or tenants in common, each joint occupant, being equally entitled to possession, need not retreat when attacked while in the building or premises by the other joint occupant [85]

Occupancy of part of house A person who is rightfully occupying a room or part of a house is not obliged to retreat when he is attacked while in his room or rooms,[86] but the rule is otherwise where the attack is made on him at a time when he is in another part of the house [87]

d. Deceased's Premises

Ordinarily a person attacked by the owner of premises while on such premises is required to retreat

Where one is a trespasser on the lands of deceased it is his duty, if he could do so without increasing his peril, to depart and to escape by retreating rather than to take the life of his assailant [88] Where one provokes the difficulty in another's home, it is his duty to retreat [89] It has even been held that where accused had a right to be on deceased's premises he should have retreated before resorting to homicide,[90] but it has also been held that, even though he was on the lands of deceased, accused was not bound to retreat where he was exercising his right and performing his duty to use all reasonable means, short of a breach of the peace, to prevent his sister and deceased from accomplishing their immoral and unlawful purpose to engage in sexual intercourse [91]

e. Employer's Premises

A person who is attacked in his employer's place of business by an outsider, and in some instances even by another employee, need not retreat

A person who is assailed in his employer's place of business by an outsider with a deadly weapon may defend himself to the extent of taking his assailant's life without first retreating [92] It has been held that the fact that both deceased and accused were employed by a railroad company and the difficulty occurred in a railroad yard where they were employed does not excuse accused from the duty of retreat,[93] but it has also been held that, whatever the rule as to fellow employees generally, as to a foreman in charge of the employer's work the employer's premises constitute the foreman's "place of business" so that he is under no duty to retreat before the attack of another employee [94]

f. Host's Premises

A person who is a guest at the house of another need not retreat when attacked in the dwelling or when attacked within the curtilage of his host[95]

by an outsider;[96] but where both deceased and accused were guests at the same house and hence on an equal footing so far as the law of self-defense is concerned, it was the duty of accused, when assaulted by deceased, to retreat if he could have done so with safety and thus avoid taking the life of his assailant.[97]

§ 131. Manner or Means of Repelling Attack

a In general
b Use of deadly weapon

a. In General

It is a commonly accepted rule that a person attacked may use only such means or force to repel the attack as is or reasonably appears to be necessary

Since self-defense is ex vi termini a defensive and not an offensive act, the means or force which a person is justified in using in self-defense depends on the circumstances of the attack and must in no case exceed the bounds of what is necessary or reasonably appears to be necessary for the purposes of mere defense and prevention,[98] but if the one attacked uses such means or force only as is necessary or as reasonably appears to be necessary to repel the attack and save himself from death or great bodily harm, and the death of his assailant ensues, it is justifiable or excusable homicide.[99] While the act of the slayer must not be entirely disproportionate to the assault made on him,[1] and for a clearly marked excess of force the law will deem him the aggressor[2] and hold him responsible[3] for manslaughter at least,[4] a person who is in danger of immediately losing his life or suffering great personal injury or the commission of a felony on him is not bound at his peril to determine with exactness and absolute certainty the amount of force necessary to meet the danger and repel the attack, he will not be held guilty merely because on a nice balancing of the probabilities it appears that a little less force would have secured his safety.[5] The amount of force apparently necessary is to be determined in the light of the circumstances as they appeared to accused,[6] and not in the light of the circumstances as they subsequently appear to the jury to have been.[7] While it is not a condition to the exercise of the right of self-defense in a proper case that deceased have been, or known as, a dangerous man, see supra § 126 b (1) (a), more prompt and decisive measures of self-defense are justified when the assailant is of known violent and bloodthirsty nature than when he is not.[8]

In at least one jurisdiction the applicability of the rule that only the necessary amount of force may be used depends on the nature of the danger or attack. If the attack is nonfelonious or less than deadly the rule is applicable and the slayer may not use more force than is reasonably necessary to repel the attack,[9] but, if the real or apparent danger is such as to threaten loss of life or serious bodily injury, the rule that a person is not justified in using more force than the circumstances reasonably indicate to be necessary is not applicable, the only question being whether in the light of all the facts accused had the right of self-defense, in such case the right to kill is a corollary of the right of self-defense.[10]

b. Use of Deadly Weapon

The use of a deadly weapon in self-defense is justifiable or excusable when, and only when, it is necessary or reasonably or apparently necessary to defend against death or great bodily harm.

The use of a deadly weapon or other resistance of like effect in self-defense is justifiable or excusable when, and only when, it is necessary or reasonably or apparently necessary to defend against death or great bodily harm.[11] Accused is justified in having repelled an assault on him with a weapon similar to that used by deceased in making the assault.[12] Ordinarily the use of a deadly weapon is not justifiable in repelling an attack without a weapon,[13] an attack which is of a trifling character and which manifests no purpose or intention on the part of the assailant to inflict any serious injury,[14] a slight,[15] simple,[16] or nonfelonious[17] assault, or an assault with blows from the hand or fist[18] or with insulting words and blows.[19] However, it is not true as a matter of law that in all cases an attack with the fists alone or an attack by an unarmed man does not justify accused in the use of a deadly weapon in such manner as to produce death, there may be other circumstances, such as the very violence of the attack or a great disparity in the age or physical ability of the persons, which give accused reasonable ground to apprehend danger of death or great bodily harm and justify him in employing a deadly weapon in self-defense [20] The infliction of a mortal wound with a dagger is not reasonably required or necessary in order to repel an attack with a piece of bamboo, it exceeds the limits of necessary self-defense [21]

Continuing to shoot Where a person is justified in firing the first shot, he is justified in continuing to shoot until it is apparent that the danger to his life or body has ceased [22] Ordinarily one is not justified in shooting or employing a deadly weapon against his antagonist after the latter has been disarmed[23] or disabled [24] Although accused fired the first shot in necessary self-defense, yet he was not justified in firing a subsequent shot or shots, which produced death, at a time when he was no longer in danger and could not have entertained any reasonable fear of losing his life or receiving great bodily harm [25] Even though the last shot was intentional and may seem to have been unnecessary when considered in cold blood, accused does not necessarily lose his immunity if it followed close on the others while the heat of the conflict was on, and if accused believed that he was fighting for his life [26] Where the first and fatal shots were fired in necessary self-defense, the fact that accused fired other shots which neither contributed to nor hastened the death of deceased does not deprive accused of the right to plead self-defense [27]

§ 132. Pursuit of Adversary

Where a person assailed is under no duty to retreat, he may pursue his adversary until he has secured himself from all danger, but he may not pursue and kill his adversary after he knows or has reason to believe that the danger is no longer imminent

Where a person free from fault is attacked by another, who manifestly intends by violence to take his life or to do him great bodily harm or to commit a known felony upon him, and the circumstances are such that the person assailed is not required to retreat, as discussed supra §§ 127–130, many authorities hold that he may even pursue his adversary until he has secured himself from all danger or apparent danger, and if he kills his adversary in so doing, it is justifiable self-defense [28] The mere fact that the adversary withdraws does not deprive accused of the right to pursue where the withdrawal is merely for the apparent purpose of securing a better position from which to renew the combat [29] However, all authorities agree that the person assailed may not, even in the most extreme case, pursue and kill his adversary after he knows or has reasonable grounds for believing that the danger has ceased to be immediate and impending, as where the adversary, in good faith, retreats or endeavors to withdraw from the combat [30] The apparent intent of deceased in withdrawing is to be judged by appearances from the standpoint of accused at the time [31]

§ 133. Renewal of Conflict

Where a person renews a conflict which has terminated or which his adversary has abandoned, he is not justified in claiming self-defense, but where the adversary renews the conflict the accused's right of self-defense is not affected by the original encounter although he was the aggressor therein

Where after the original difficulty had ceased or deceased had abandoned it, or accused had an opportunity of declining further combat, and he instead continued the struggle or renewed the combat, he became the aggressor, irrespective of whether he was at fault in bringing on the original difficulty, and is not justified in claiming self-defense,[32] but, where the contest is renewed by the adversary, accused's right of self-defense is not affected by the original encounter, even though he was the aggressor therein,[33] and regardless whether deceased was in a cool state of mind or in a violent passion.[34] While it has been held that accused cannot properly plead self-defense where, instead of attempting to avoid further trouble after the cessation of an altercation, he needlessly and purposely put himself in the way of a renewal thereof,[35] it has also been held that a mere intent on the part of one in returning to the scene of trouble to provoke a difficulty is insufficient to limit his right of self-defense unless he commits some provocative act.[36] One who returns to the scene of the difficulty for the purpose of remonstrating against the continuance of deceased's abusive conduct does not thereby forfeit his right of self-defense.[37]

§ 134. Self-Defense by or against Particular Persons

An insane person may plead self-defense, and the right of self-defense is not affected merely by the relationship between the accused and the deceased

An insane person charged with homicide may plead self-defense.[38] Ties of blood or relationship between accused and deceased do not affect the right of self-defense.[39]

§ 135. —— Against Third Person

The right of self-defense against an assailant does not extend to the killing of an innocent third person

The right of self-defense may be exercised only against the person threatening death or bodily injury, it does not extend to the killing of an innocent third person.[40]

The fact that accused is guilty of such conduct toward one person as would impair his right of self-defense as against such person does not deprive him of the right to defend himself against an attack made on him by a third person.[41]

§ 136. —— Against Two or More Persons

Where the accused is attacked by several persons acting in concert, he may, in a proper case, defend himself by killing any one or all of them

Where accused is attacked by two or more persons, or is attacked by one person and others are acting with the assailant or are present and aiding and encouraging him, he has a right to act in self-defense against all and, in a proper case, to kill one or all.[42] However, accused is not justified in killing one of such persons where he does not entertain a belief that he is in danger of serious bodily injury or loss of life at the hands of such person.[43]

b. Killing of officer

a. Killing by Officer

An officer or other person authorized to make an arrest, when confronted with such resistance to an attempted arrest as to endanger or apparently endanger his life or limb, may kill in self-defense, and the ordinary requirements of freedom from aggression and attempt to retreat on the part of the slayer do not apply. A person attempting to make an unlawful arrest generally has no greater right to kill in self-defense than one not so engaged.

Where a public officer or other person having legal authority to make an arrest is lawfully engaged in an attempt to arrest and is resisted by the person to be arrested in such a manner that he believes, on reasonable grounds, that he is about to be killed or to receive great bodily harm, he may resist force with force, and, if it is necessary in self-defense, he is justified in taking the life of such person.[44] Although, as appears supra § 102, an officer generally is held justified in killing to effectuate the arrest or prevent the escape of a felon even though it is not necessary for him to do so in self-defense, but is not justified in killing a misdemeanant merely to effectuate his arrest or prevent his escape, nevertheless where the resistance offered by a misdemeanant is such as to create in the officer the reasonable belief that he is about to be killed or to receive great bodily harm, the officer may be justified in killing on the ground of self-defense.[45] However, the mere fact that a person resists arrest and assaults the person attempting to make the arrest does not necessarily and alone give to the latter a right to kill to protect his person from bodily harm,[46] there must be a real or apparent necessity to justify a resort to such an extreme measure.[47] The killing is not justifiable, on the ground of self-defense, where the person being arrested makes no resistance[48] or where the injury threatened by him is not a serious one.[49]

Where the officer is known to be one having legal authority to arrest, he need not show or read the warrant before the arrest is made in order to justify the killing.[50] An officer making an arrest is not deprived of the legal right to defend himself by reason of a mere formal defect in the warrant of arrest or the complaint on which it is based.[51]

Aggression and retreat The rule that to be entitled to invoke the right of self-defense the slayer must not have been the aggressor is not applicable to an officer who, while making an arrest or preventing escape, kills in self-defense;[52] for if freedom from aggression were essential to his protection an officer could not perform his duties properly.[53] In making an authorized arrest for a misdemeanor, an officer is not the "aggressor" in the sense in which that term is used in designating the moving party in encounters between private citizens.[54] Likewise a peace officer called on to quell a disturbance between deceased and another person cannot be regarded as having voluntarily provoked and brought on the difficulty so as to deprive him of the right to kill to protect himself from death or great bodily injury.[55]

A public officer, or one acting under his authority, who is attacked while in the lawful exercise of his duties, is under no duty to retreat, but may stand his ground and kill his assailant if necessary to save himself from death or great bodily harm,[56] but the person claiming such right must have been acting within the law.[57] The rule is applicable where a private citizen is attacked while in the exercise of his right to make an arrest, as where he had reasonable grounds to believe that deceased had committed a felony.[58]

Unlawful arrest Ordinarily self-defense will not justify a homicide committed by an officer or other person while attempting to make an unlawful arrest,[59] except where the resistance used is disproportionate to the force employed to detain, and is of such a character as unnecessarily to place the person attempting the arrest in danger of death or great bodily harm.[60] Where a person attempts to arrest without authority, he is to that extent the aggressor as he is acting without right.[61] However, where the person sought to be arrested attempts to kill the person seeking to make the arrest merely to prevent the threatened arrest and not to protect himself from danger or injury, then he is about to use an excess of force which, to that extent, makes him the aggressor and confers on the arresting person the right of self-defense.[62] Where a police officer is not acting as such at the time of the difficulty, his right of self-defense is the same as that of a private citizen.[63]

b. Killing of Officer

The killing of an officer or other person attempting to make a lawful arrest ordinarily cannot be excused or justified as in self-defense, but if the attempted arrest is unlawful the killing of the officer may be excused or justified as in self-defense if in the course of resistance to the arrest it becomes necessary to prevent death or great bodily harm, or even, according to some authorities, to retain or regain liberty.

The right of self-defense will not justify or excuse one who in the course of a lawful arrest properly attempted kills the officer or person who is attempting to arrest him,[64] but where the attempt to arrest is unlawful in itself or by reason of the manner in which it is attempted the person being arrested may resist with force, and if in the course of the ensuing struggle it becomes necessary or reasonably appears to be necessary for him to kill the person attempting the arrest in order to save himself from death or great bodily harm, or the commission of a felony upon him, it is justifiable homicide,[65] and this is true although the slayer is a fugitive from justice and accused of a felony.[66] So too, one who is restrained of his liberty under an illegal arrest may use such force as is necessary to regain his liberty, and, if it reasonably appears that the officer intends to kill him or do him great bodily harm in order to prevent his escape, he may kill the officer in self-defense [67]

A few courts hold that a person has a right to resist an unlawful arrest, even to the extent of taking the life of another, if it is necessary in order to regain his liberty and freedom,[68] or if it is necessary as an alternative to submission [69] These courts hold that a person has as much right to resist an invasion of his personal liberty, and under proper circumstances to take life, as he has to resist death or serious bodily injury,[70] that the right to resist arrest and the right of self-defense are fundamentally separate and distinct,[71] and that the existence of an actual belief by accused of the necessity to take the life of his assailant in order to protect himself from death or serious bodily harm, and the existence of circumstances sufficient to justify such a belief in the mind of a person possessed of ordinary firmness and reason, are not prerequisite to the exercise of the right to resist an unlawful arrest even to the extent of taking the life of another [72] However, the right to resist an unlawful arrest generally is treated as a phase of the right of self-defense [73] As in other cases of self-defense, a person is justified in taking life only when he has reasonable ground to apprehend that he is in imminent danger of death or great bodily harm, he is not justified in killing merely for the purpose of resisting an unlawful arrest or other restraint on his liberty and where the only injury which can be reasonably apprehended is unlawful detention for a short time or other injury short of death or serious bodily harm [74] The use of excessive force in resisting an unlawful arrest constitutes an unlawful attack[75] and eliminates the right of self-defense on the part of the person resisting [76]

Notice or knowledge of authority Except where the statute expressly requires that the officer making the arrest must make known to the person accused under what authority the arrest is made,[77] the mere fact that the officer attempting the arrest failed to inform accused of the warrant, of his official character, or of the intent to arrest, does not justify or excuse killing the officer,[78] especially where accused knew that the officer had the warrant and that his purpose was to arrest him,[79] or had notice of his official character,[80] or where the

A person has no right actively to resist an illegal arrest until the officer has done some overt act such as laying his hands upon him, and the mere statement by the officer to one sought to be unlawfully arrested to consider himself under arrest or that the officer has a warrant does not give the right to make a physical attack upon the officer, furthermore, a person sought to be illegally arrested must cease resistance if the officer desists from his effort to arrest - State v Francis, 149 S E 348, 152 S C 17, 70 A L R 1133

Failure to wear badge

Conviction of murder of railroad policeman will be sustained, although he was not at the time wearing badge, where accused knew he was a policeman —Atkins v State, 155 N E 189, 115 Ohio St 542, certiorari denied 17 S Ct 590, 274 U S 720, 71 L Ed 1324.

lack of such information was caused by his fleeing on seeing the officer approach [81] If, however, accused had not, and cannot be charged with, knowledge of the official character of the officer, the fact that deceased was an officer attempting to make an arrest did not deprive him of his right of self-defense,[82] and it has been held that, even though a person has been told by a third person that officers were likely to arrest him, nevertheless he is warranted in repelling an assault made on him by an officer unless he has acquired knowledge in some other way that he is being halted by an officer [83] A person cannot rely on the failure of the officer to state his authority or purpose as rendering the attempted arrest unlawful so as to justify resistance, where in the absence of any grounds for the apprehension of danger he attacks the officer as soon as he is accosted without giving the officer an opportunity to show his authority or purpose [84] Where a person states that he is an officer seeking to arrest accused for a stated offense, accused may either submit at once or demand proof of such person's authority, but if he resists such person without giving him an opportunity to show his authority he cannot plead self-defense if it turns out that such person is an officer [85] Self-defense is not available to a person who knew or had reason to believe that deceased was an officer and that his mission was the execution of a writ of possession and the homicide occurred before deceased had an opportunity to declare his purpose [86] Where accused knew that deceased was acting officially in taking him into custody, the fact that deceased made the arrest without a warrant and hence did not act technically within his rights furnishes no justification or excuse for a homicide committed in order to effect an escape from further detention [87] Likewise, where accused knew that deceased was an officer and was in good faith using no more force than was reasonably necessary to execute the warrant, the fact that the warrant was defective conferred on accused no legal right to kill the officer for the sole purpose of preventing the arrest [88] Where accused had attempted to commit a felony, he was charged with knowledge that a private person might lawfully arrest him, so that his ignorance of the identity of the officer who attempted to arrest him did not justify his killing of the officer [89]

Resistance of de facto officer A person who resists a de facto officer and slays him while in the discharge of his apparent duty has only such defense as would exist were the person slain an officer de jure [90]

Where officer not attempting to arrest A person attacked by a policeman independent of any attempt to arrest has the same right to defend himself as against a private citizen [91] Accused cannot urge as a defense that he killed deceased in resisting unlawful arrest where there was no threat of an arrest at the time of the homicide [92] The fact that a peace officer is attempting lawfully and with reasonable force to eject a person from a public street does not give such person any greater right of self-defense than if the officer were lawfully attempting to arrest him [93] The killing of a policeman, even when he is acting in excess of his authority in dispersing a public meeting, will not be excused on the ground of self-defense because of a supposed violation of the rights of the persons composing the meeting [94] A person who is not resisting an arrest but who is the aggressor and who commences the affray by attempting to capture an officer cannot properly claim the right to kill the officer because the latter resists an illegal command to throw up his hands.[95] The killing of an officer several hours after he was captured by accused is not excused or justified by the fact that at the time he was captured he was making an investigation without legal authority therefor.[96] A person lawfully accosted for reasonable questioning under circumstances suggesting that a crime has been or is about to be committed is not justified in slaying the accoster in the absence of any reasonable apprehension of danger.[97]

§ 138. —— By Pupil against Teacher

In a proper case a pupil may kill a teacher in self-defense.

A pupil may be entitled to exercise the right to kill in self-defense against a school teacher inflicting punishment which is immoderate and in excess of the authority of the teacher or which is malicious or for the purpose of revenge, and the question is to be determined from accused's standpoint and the circumstances prompting him at the time.[98]

VII. INDICTMENT OR INFORMATION

A. FOR HOMICIDE

§ 139. In General

The rules governing indictments and informations generally, such as the necessity for averment of the essential elements of the offense charged, the certainty and precision required, the necessity for the use of technical terms, the effect of surplusage, and the propriety of averring different offenses in the same count ordinarily control in indictments or informations charging homicide

Indictments or informations for homicide are, except as may be otherwise required by statute or by the inherent character of the offense charged, controlled by the rules applicable to indictments and informations in criminal prosecutions generally. For example, they must state with certainty and precision[99] the facts essential to constitute the offense charged,[1] sufficient to give notice to accused of the particular accusation which he must prepare to meet.[2] Where the common law prevails, great strictness and technical accuracy are required.[3] Otherwise, however, the necessary allegations need not be expressed in the technical terms generally employed, but any words which are the legal equivalent thereof are sufficient,[4] nor is an indictment defective because the customary order of words is not followed.[5] Nothing material in the indictment shall be taken by intendment or implication.[6] A misspelling of material words may be fatal,[7] but, as in the case of other indictments, the mere misspelling of a word,[8] or an omission,[9] by which the meaning of the indictment is not obscured, is as a general rule immaterial

Two distinct offenses cannot lawfully be embodied in the same count,[10] but mere elaboration of the details of the particular offense charged will not render the indictment bad[11]

Surplusage may generally be disregarded,[12] the statutes sometimes expressly so providing[13]

It is desirable, although not necessary, to follow approved precedents as to form[14]

§ 140. Negativing Defenses or Statutory Exceptions

The indictment or information need not negative matters of defense or statutory exceptions, unless they form a portion of the description of the offense charged

In conformance with the rule governing indictments or informations in criminal prosecutions generally, see the C J S title Indictments and Informations § 116, also 31 C J p 672 note 46–p 673 note 51, an indictment or information charging a homicide need not negative matters of defense,[15] such as the commission of the act in self-defense,[16] nor is it necessary for the indictment to anticipate and negative testimony which may be offered by accused as to other independent causes of death[17] An allegation that an act was unlawful and felonious,[18] or with malice and purpose to kill,[19] or with premeditated design to effect death,[20] is sufficient without negativing the circumstance under which the act might have been innocent As in the case of other offenses, see the C J S title Indictments and Informations § 140, also 31 C J p 720 note 56–p 726 note 1, where an indictment is drawn under a statute, exceptions in the statute must be negatived where they form a portion of the description of the statutory offense,[21] but not otherwise[22] The exceptions may be alleged in the conjunctive where to do so does not alter the statutory description of the offense[23] It is not an objection that the negative averment contained in the indictment is more defective because the words 'and of his malice aforethought' intervened between "feloniously" and 'kill and murder"—State v Holbrook, supra

§ 141. Statutory Provisions and Forms

Under the statutes in force in many jurisdictions an indictment for homicide which charges the offense in simple and concise language is sufficient. A charge in the language of the statute under which the offense is charged, or in conformity with a statutory form, is good.

Under the statutes of criminal procedure existing in many states, much of the common-law technicality concerning an indictment for homicide has been removed, and it is sufficient if the indictment charges the essentials of the offense in simple and concise language[26] It is, however, necessary to allege every essential element of the crime

This form of indictment is much less likely to mislead or confuse than the archaic, cumbersome, and uselessly meticulous common-law form Since the adoption of a simple statutory definition of murder it is no longer necessary to use the old common-law form with its unnecessarily detailed allegations, which tended not only to confuse the mind but also to produce variances in proof in respect of matters which are really immaterial—Pell v State, 122 So 110, 97 Fla 650

(13) Indictment, alleging that accused did willfully, feloniously, deliberately, premeditatedly, and with charged[27] in language sufficient plainly and fully to inform accused of the nature and cause of the accusation against him[28] Where murder[29] or manslaughter,[30] although defined by statute, is defined as at common law, an indictment following the common-law form will be sufficient and ordinarily, as appears infra § 162, under statutes dividing murder into degrees a good common-law indictment for murder will sustain a conviction for any of the statutory degrees Under some statutes altering the common-law definition of murder[31] or manslaughter,[32] an indictment in the common-law form is not sufficient, and, as appears infra § 162, this is also true under some statutes dividing murder into degrees Since a statute defining "willful murder" does not create a new crime, an indictment thereunder is not defective in charging "murder" instead of "willful murder"[33] It is not necessary to indicate specifically the statute under which accused is charged[34]

Under constitutional and statutory provisions allowing a prosecution for felony by indictment or information, it has been held that the formal requirements of an information charging the offense of murder are not different from those in the case of a charge of some other felony[35]

Charge in language of statute. An indictment or information charging the homicide in the language of the statute defining it,[36] or substantially so,[37] is ordinarily held sufficient, sometimes under statutes so providing, where the statute sets out all the elements constituting the offense,[38] or is completely descriptive of the offense,[39] and in some jurisdictions such form is required[40] However, where a statute uses general or generic terms in describing an offense, does not sufficiently define the crime, or set out all its essential elements, or where a charge in the language of the statute charges a mere legal conclusion, an indictment or information which alleges the crime in the language of the statute is not sufficient; a more particular statement of facts is necessary[41] Statutes authorizing the omission of descriptive averments have been construed as confined to cases where it will do no prejudice, and not to authorize the omission of anything which is essential to the description of the offense.[42] Involuntary manslaughter has been held not to belong to that class of crimes which may be charged in the language of the statute.[43]

Short forms An indictment is valid which follows a prescribed statutory form[44] or a form prescribed by a valid rule of court,[45] particularly where supplemented by a bill of particulars,[46] and has been held not to violate the constitutional right of accused[47] to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation against him.[48] A form which is prepared by code commissioners, however, is insufficient where it does not comply with the general statutory requirements as to indictments and informations.[49] In some jurisdictions the state may use either the common-law or the statutory form of indictment.[50] If the statutory form of indictment is used, while in general it must be strictly adhered to,[51] it need not be literally followed,[52] substantial conformity is sufficient.[53] However, an indictment which attempts to mingle a common-law and a statutory form, without fully embracing the requirements of either, is defective.[54] A statute requiring a count for a particular offense to be included does not apply where the facts do not authorize such a count.[55]

§ 142. Time of Offense

The indictment or information should show the time of the offense charged; but, subject to the requirement that it must show that the offense was committed before its finding or filing and that the death occurred within a year and a day from the date of the infliction of the injury, the time is not ordinarily such a material element as to require precise averment.

Conformably to the general rules as to the necessity for, and the sufficiency of, averments as to the time of the offense, see the C.J.S. title Indictments and Informations §§ 123–126, also 31 C.J. p. 680 note 64–p. 689 note 17, the indictment or information must ordinarily allege the time of the offense charged.[56] Where the common-law rule has not been changed by statute, an allegation of time is essential as to the commission of the act causing the death,[57] and as to each material fact alleged,[58] including the striking or time of infliction of the injury[59] and the death, see infra § 155 a, although, as appears infra § 178, these allegations need not be proved as laid. However, under the statutes in force in many jurisdictions an averment as to the time the homicide was committed is not material,[60] and is not an essential element to be alleged,[61] other than to show that the death occurred within a year and a day from the date of the infliction of the injury, which must appear from the indictment or information, see infra § 155 a, and that the offense was committed before the finding or filing of the indictment or information, which is ordinarily required,[62] although under the express provisions of some statutes an indictment will not be deemed invalid, or the judgment thereon arrested, for stating the offense to have been committed on a day subsequent to the finding of the indictment.[63] In general it is sufficient to allege that accused, on a certain day, killed deceased.[64] However, the precise date of the offense need not be alleged,[65] and under some statutes it may be omitted.[66] So an indictment or information is sufficient in its allegations as to the time of the offense where it avers or shows that the homicide was committed before the finding or filing of the indictment or information,[67] as where the acts constituting the offense are alleged in the imperfect or past tense, although no specific date is stated,[68] or where the indictment in code form charges in general terms, without date, that before the finding of the indictment accused committed the offense;[69] or where it is alleged that the murder was committed in a certain year, before the finding of the indictment,[70] or that accused committed a negligent act on a certain date and that "subsequently" the death of deceased was caused thereby,[71] or where the indictment fails to state the day of the month, if it appears that the offense was committed before the finding of the indictment and the death occurred within a year and a day of the wounding,[72] or where it alleges as the date of deceased's death a date prior to the date on which the indictment was returned.[73]

Date as of which offense occurred In some jurisdictions it has been held that the date of the homicide is properly alleged as of the date of the death where the death and wounding do not occur on the same day.[74] In others, however, it has been held that, since the essence of the crime is the infliction of the wound from which death ensues, the date of the offense is properly charged as of the date of the mortal blow.[75] The indictment or information may allege a continuing offense covering more than one date.[76]

Misstatement of date Ordinarily a misstatement as to the exact date of the commission of the homicide is immaterial and will not render the indictment or information bad.[77] Mere formal mistakes,

Repetition of date A repetition of the date as to a nonessential allegation is not necessary,[79] and a failure to repeat it before the allegation of the mortal wound has been held not to vitiate an indictment [80] An indictment which alleges the date of the assault and when accused held the weapon in his hand, but fails to repeat it as to the blow itself, is sufficient [81] Allegations of time may be repeated by words of reference, such as "then and there,"[82] "then" alone,[83] or "aforesaid"[84]

Showing offense within period of limitations Since a prosecution for a particular offense or crime is not barred by lapse of time, unless a period of prescription or limitation is fixed by law therefor, see Criminal Law § 223, in the absence of a statute barring a prosecution for murder, it is not necessary to show that the offense was within any period of limitations [85] However, where a prosecution is for manslaughter, which under the particular statute may be barred, the averment of time is necessary to show that limitations have not run, although the indictment is in form for murder [86]

§ 143. Place of Offense

The place of the offense must be alleged with sufficient particularity to show that it is within the jurisdiction of the court

It is essential that an indictment or information for homicide allege the place of the offense for the purpose of showing that it is within the jurisdiction of the court,[87] unless the necessity therefor has been obviated by statute [88] The allegation is in general required only to be sufficiently certain for that purpose,[89] but in some jurisdictions it is necessary to allege the place of the infliction of the wound [90] Ordinarily an allegation that the offense occurred in a certain county is sufficient [91] A charge that in a certain county accused killed deceased by certain acts sufficiently states that the acts as well as the killing took place in the county named [92]

Repetition of averment of place At common law it was necessary that the averment of place be repeated to every material fact in the indictment,[93] but this rule has been greatly relaxed under modern statutes, and it is sufficient if the place clearly appears from the entire indictment [94] Allegations of place may be repeated by words of reference such as "then and there"[95] or "aforesaid"[96]

§ 144. Description of Accused

dictments and Informations § 127, also 31 C J p 689 note 18–p 693 note 14, the indictment or information for homicide must be clear and certain as to the persons charged.[98] It is not necessary to state his residence[99] or other matter of particular description,[1] nor is it necessary to allege that accused was of sound memory and discretion,[2] or of sound mind[3]

An indictment charging accused with murder under a statute governing murder by convicts should allege that accused is a convict of the specified class[4]

§ 145. Description of Person Killed

- a In general
- b Sex, description of females
- c Social and civil status
- d Description of child
- e Other matters of description

a. In General

The indictment or information must so describe the person killed that the accused may know whom he or she is charged with having killed, if known, the name of the deceased must be alleged, but if unknown it need not be, provided that fact is alleged

The indictment or information must be so certain as to the person against whom the offense was committed that the person indicted may know and understand whom he or she is charged with having killed[5] The name of the deceased must be alleged, if known[6]

Name unknown If the name of the deceased is unknown to the grand jury, an indictment will be sufficient if it states such fact, either as to the Christian name,[7] the surname,[8] or the full name,[9] and describes him by a fictitious name[10] If the name is not known the indictment must allege the fact, and give as clear a description of the person injured as the facts before the grand jury will permit[11] When deceased is once described as a person whose name is unknown, he may be identified in subsequent allegations by words of reference[12]

Form and sufficiency of allegations A description of deceased by the name by which he is commonly known is sufficient, although variant from his true name,[13] and where the deceased was known by two names it is sufficient to allege either[14] It may be sufficient to employ the initials of the first name[15] An error in the middle name of the deceased is not material[16] An indictment for the killing of a freed man has been held sufficient, although it describes deceased by a Christian name only[17] Under some statutes an error in the name of the person deceased is not material where the offense is described in other respects with sufficient certainty to identify the act[18]

Repetition, variations, and place of averring name Where the name of a person has been once well stated, a variance in its repetition has been held not fatal unless prejudicial to accused,[19] as has the occurrence of a blank in place of a subsequent repetition,[20] or the omission of a word of reference to connect the repeated name with that previously stated[21] The word "alias" sufficiently expresses the meaning "otherwise called" or "otherwise known as,"[22] and where a person is known by two names, and both are stated under an alias, it is immaterial which is first stated or which is the true name.[23] Where the full name has been once well stated, an alias giving only a single name is not defective.[24] The state may designate deceased by different names in different counts,[25] or by a certain name in one count and as a person unknown in another.[26] Different spellings of the name of deceased, where they are idem sonans, do not render the charge defective.[27] If the name of the deceased is contained in the averment of the assault or infliction of the injury, its omission in the averment of death is immaterial.[28] However, it has been held that the name must be stated in the conclusion of an indictment for murder,[29] although it need not appear in order after the word "murder" if the conclusion clearly states the murder of a particular person,[30] and a conviction for manslaughter may be sustained where the name of the person killed is omitted from the conclusion.[31]

b. Sex; Description of Females

The sex of the person killed need not be alleged, unless the killing occurs in the commission of another offense which can be committed only on a female, and where that fact is otherwise shown a specific averment thereof is unnecessary. Ordinarily it is unnecessary to allege that a female killed in an attempt to procure an abortion was pregnant or quick with child.

It is not necessary to allege the sex of the person killed,[32] except when the killing occurs in the perpetration of another offense which may be committed only on a female.[33] In an indictment for homicide in the commission of, or attempt to commit, a crime on a female, the fact that deceased was a female is sufficiently shown by use of a feminine name and pronoun[34] or a reference to her womb,[35] or both.[36] An indictment or information for the murder or manslaughter of a female in an attempt to procure an abortion need not allege that she was pregnant[37] or quick with child,[38] but the rule has been held otherwise in an indictment for manslaughter where the words are made a descriptive averment in the statutory definition.[39]

c. Social and Civil Status

It is unnecessary to set out the social and civil status of the person killed, unless they are included in the definition of the crime as an element of the offense.

As a general rule, it is unnecessary to set out particular descriptive matters with relation to the person killed.[40] So, on an indictment for killing an officer in the discharge of his duty, the fact that deceased was an officer so acting need not ordinarily be alleged.[41] However, such descriptive matters may be necessary in a prosecution under a statute making such matters, other than those ordinarily included in the definition of the crime, an element of the offense.[42]

d. Description of Child

An indictment for the murder of a child may describe it as not named, or as of name unknown, and may identify it by reference to the names of its parents. Age and sex need not be alleged.

An indictment for the murder of a child may describe the child as not named,[43] or as of name unknown.[44] The indictment need not expressly state that the child was born alive.[45] Its age[46] or sex[47] need not be stated. Accused cannot complain of the use of the names of the child's parents unless he was misled thereby[48] A description of a child as one without a name, the child of a woman named, is a sufficient averment of its surname[49]

e. Other Matters of Description

In general it is unnecessary to allege that the person killed was a human being, or a reasonable creature in being, or that he was "in the peace of the state" or a similar statement

It has been held that, where the language of the statute is not followed, and the indictment does not describe the offense as murder, which, as appears supra § 13, is defined as the unlawful killing of a human being, etc, the indictment, although naming the person killed, should state that he was a human being[50] As a general rule it need not be alleged that the person slain was a human being[51] where the name of the person killed is set out in the indictment,[52] at least where it is alleged that accused "murdered" the person named,[53] or committed an assault and battery on him,[54] and refers to said person named by the personal pronoun "he" or "him,"[55] particularly where the crime is pleaded in the form and language of the statute[56] A charge of killing an Indian is sufficient to aver the killing of a human being[57] It is not necessary to allege that the person killed was a reasonable creature in being,[58] or a person,[59] or to describe him as "the deceased"[60]

An averment that the person killed was "in the peace of the state"[61] or "in the peace of God"[62] is unnecessary

§ 146. Act or Omission Causing Death

In the absence of statute authorizing its omission, the act constituting the offense must be clearly alleged. All the parties accused may be charged as principals or they may be charged as principals and accessaries as the facts warrant If a conspiracy existed, it need not be alleged

In the absence of statute authorizing its omission, a clear and substantive charge of the act constituting the offense is necessary[63] The exact form of words is immaterial[64] Under the varying statutes in different jurisdictions various short forms of indictments or informations are sufficient, such as that accused murdered deceased,[65] that accused voluntarily killed deceased,[66] that accused voluntarily with malice aforethought killed deceased,[67] and under some it is sufficient to charge the homicide by name,[68] but in such case the court, in the exercise of a reasonable discretion, should be liberal in granting a bill of particulars where necessary to inform accused what the state expects to prove against him[69] Acts and omissions constituting the offense may be charged in the conjunctive[70] It is not necessary to repeat in the conclusion the acts which accused did[71]

Principals or accessaries The indictment may charge accused as a principal regardless of whether he was an accessary, aider, or abettor[72] Where two or more persons are charged with the crime, it is unnecessary to show whether the crime is charged to have been committed by the joint act of defendants or whether one is charged as an accessary[73] The indictment may charge all the defendants as principals,[74] or it may allege the matter according to the facts and charge the various defendants as principals and accessaries as the facts warrant,[75] nor is it necessary where the indictment charges accused and others with a homicide to allege whether accused committed the crime with the others in a joint enterprise or individually in a separate enterprise[76]

Conspiracy An indictment which charges two or more persons as principals need not charge a conspiracy in pursuance of which the homicide was committed[77]

§ 147. —— Omission of Duty or Negligence

Where the homicide is charged to have resulted from a negligent act or omission the indictment or information must be with certainty sufficient to put the accused on notice of the offense with which he is charged The act or omission must be alleged and such facts and circumstances as are essential to show negligence, but the duty violated, or the standard of care required, ordinarily need not be averred

In general, where the homicide is alleged to have resulted from a negligent act or omission, the indictment or information is sufficient where it puts accused on notice of the offense with which he is charged[78] There must be certainty in making the charge,[79] but no more certainty is required in charging manslaughter resulting from negligent inaction than from negligent action[80] All the facts and circumstances essential to show the neglect must be set forth,[81] but it is also held, where the acts in which accused was engaged are stated, that the charge is sufficient without setting out in detail in what the negligence consisted[82] However, under statutes providing that it shall be sufficient, in an indictment for manslaughter, to charge that accused did feloniously kill and slay deceased, it has been held that, where the acts constituting alleged culpable negligence are set forth in an indictment for manslaughter, the acts so alleged must be of such character as to warrant an inference of culpable negligence therefrom,[83] but an indictment which charges that accused did feloniously kill and slay deceased by culpable negligence is not defective because of a failure to set forth the conduct constituting culpable negligence.[84] Where an essential element of the homicide charged is that it must have resulted from the negligence and carelessness of accused in the performance of a specified character of act, such as a lawful or an unlawful act, it must be alleged that accused was engaged in the performance of such specified character of act, setting it out, followed by an averment of negligence and carelessness in the performance of the act.[85] The distinction between involuntary manslaughter committed while perpetrating an unlawful act not amounting to a felony and the offense arising out of some negligence or fault in doing a lawful act in a grossly negligent manner and from which death results must be kept in mind on the question of pleading.[86] In the former case, as appears infra § 148, it is sufficient to allege the unlawful act with sufficient particularity to identify it and then to charge that as a consequence accused caused the death of deceased, and there is no need to aver in detail the specific acts of accused, but in case of manslaughter committed through gross or culpable negligence while doing a lawful act the duty which was neglected or improperly performed must be charged, as well as the acts of accused, constituting failure to perform or improper performance.[87] Where a positive act causing the death is charged, it is not essential to charge expressly the duty violated,[88] but such duty must be alleged where the wrong consists merely of nonfeasance,[89] and it has been held that in a case of manslaughter committed through gross or culpable negligence, while doing a lawful act, a duty which was neglected or improperly performed must be alleged.[90] The indictment must charge a neglect that is personal.[91] It is not necessary to set up a specific standard by which accused's acts might be measured,[92] or any specific degree of negligence.[93] However, an indictment or information charging involuntary manslaughter based on the commission of an act which is unlawful because it is negligent must allege facts by which it is made to appear that the act was done wantonly or with reckless disregard for the safety of others.[94] An indictment for involuntary manslaughter is not rendered insufficient by allegations of willful and culpable negligence.[95]

To charge manslaughter for a death occurring in the operation of an unsafe airplane the indictment must charge that the operation of the plane was carried on in an unlawful manner.[96]

Several defendants Where several defendants are charged the indictment must show such a joint undertaking that the negligence of one will be imputable to the others,[97] and the definite duty of each must be stated as well as the specific acts with which they are charged.[98]

§ 148. —— In Perpetration of Another Offense

In general, although there is authority to the contrary, an ordinary charge for murder without averment of the connected felony is sufficient to charge a homicide committed in the perpetration of a felony, but such an averment is proper and may be sufficient to charge the homicide as murder. A charge of manslaughter in the commission of an unlawful act must set out the unlawful act and show that it was unlawful, but it is only necessary to plead it with sufficient detail to identify it

Where the homicide is committed in the perpetration of or attempt to perpetrate a felony, or in the withdrawal or escape therefrom, although there is authority which holds it necessary to set out in the indictment or information the felony in the pursuance of which the homicide was committed as well as the homicide,[99] it is usually held that an indictment in the ordinary form for murder or for murder in the first degree is sufficient without averment of the connected felony.[1] Hence allegations as to the connected offense may be disregarded, where the remaining averments are sufficient to charge murder or murder in the first degree in the usual form,[2] and in any event are to be deemed sufficient if accused is not misled or prejudiced.[3] However, an indictment or information may count specifically on the connected felony as supplying the necessary elements to render the homicide murder,[4] and where it does it should set forth the felony and charge the killing by accused while engaged in the commission thereof.[5] In such case, although there is some authority to the effect that the constituent felony must be averred with the same formality which would be requisite were it

Reference, in indictment charging murder in pursuance of conspiracy to break and enter box car in attempt to steal, to conspiracy was not mere surplusage.—Simmons v. Commonwealth, supra.

Indictments or informations held sufficient

(1) Indictment charging that accused and other named persons willfully and feloniously killed another, while engaged in commission of crime of robbery charged murder in first degree.—Clark v. State, 276 S.W. 849, 169 Ark. 717.

(2) Indictment charging that accused, with felonious intent to rob deceased did assault and kill him sufficiently charged first degree murder, as against contention that the use of the word "intent" instead of "attempt," the word used in the statute, rendered it insufficient.—Turnage v. State, 80 S.W.2d 865, 182 Ark. 74.

(3) Indictment, charging that accused did "unlawfully and feloniously kill and murder (deceased) in the attempt to perpetrate a robbery by shooting at and thereby mortally wounding" deceased, and containing additional averment that at same time and place defendants attempted to rob another held to sufficiently charge murder in an attempt to rob as against motion to quash.—Parker v. State, 149 N.E. 59, 196 Ind. 534.

In attempt to murder another

Where accused shot and killed deceased in attempt to murder deceased's husband, an indictment in the common form for murder in the first degree of deceased was sufficient as against contention that indictment should have alleged that accused shot deceased while he was attempting to murder deceased's husband.—Sullivan v. State, 121 S.W.2d 535, 173 Tenn. 175.

Considered surplusage

the sole basis of a count in an indictment,[6] as a general rule it is sufficient to allege that the killing was committed in the perpetration of or attempt to perpetrate a designated felony or felonies, or in the escape or withdrawal therefrom, without setting out in detail the facts constituting the alleged felony or felonies.[7] A charge of facts constituting the felony, however, will not in itself be sufficient unless such facts contain the essential elements of a charge of murder.[8] Where a killing is charged as having occurred in the perpetration of an unlawful design without intent to kill, a conviction of murder at common law cannot be sustained, where from the description of the intended offense it appears that it was not a felony.[9]

Where all participants in the perpetration of a felony in which a homicide is committed are liable as principals for the homicide committed, see supra § 9, the indictment or information may charge them all as principals and need not differentiate between them as principals and accessaries.[10] An indictment or information which charges that two or more persons shot and killed deceased is not defective because only one shot was fired where it appears that the shot was fired while those accused were jointly making a felonious assault on another.[11]

Where the connected felony is alleged, such averments refer to and are descriptive of the homicide charged, and hence the indictment or information is not duplicitous as containing a statement of more than one offense, within the meaning of a statute forbidding the charge of two or more offenses in the same indictment or information.[12]

Resisting arrest The fact that accused was resisting arrest at the time of the commission of the homicide, where such is the case, need not be alleged.[13]

Manslaughter Although it has been held sufficient in an indictment or information for manslaughter merely to charge that accused unlawfully killed deceased, without pleading the unlawful act, under statutory provisions which prescribe such a short form and also provide that it is unnecessary to set forth the manner and means of the killing,[14] by the weight of authority it is held that an indictment under a statute for manslaughter in the com-

Equivalent terms

An allegation in bill of indictment for murder, that murder was committed while defendants were in act of robbing deceased, was equivalent to alleging that it was committed in perpetration of a robbery, primary meaning of the word "perpetrate" being to do or perform—State v Linney 194 S E 470, 212 N C 739

Not duplicitous

An information is not improper and duplicitous because it alleges the homicide to have been committed while accused was engaged in several designated felonies, stated either conjunctively or in the alternative—State v Montgomery, Wash, 132 P 2d 720—State v Anderson, 116 P 2d 346, 10 Wash 2d 167 mission of an unlawful act must set out and describe the unlawful act,[15] and show that it was unlawful[16] It is sufficient to allege the unlawful act with sufficient particularity to identify it and then to charge that, as a consequence, accused caused the death of deceased, without averring in detail the specific acts of accused[17] It is not essential that the incidental offense should be pleaded with the same fullness and particularity as would be necessary if it were the sole offense charged[18] Where killing of the mother in an attempted abortion is made punishable by a specific statute, an indictment for such offense must contain all the descriptive averments of the statute, and an ordinary indictment for manslaughter is held insufficient,[19] and in some jurisdictions,[20] but not in others,[21] it is necessary to allege that the act was not necessary to save the life of the woman, or necessary for medical or surgical treatment, or was not performed or advised as necessary by a duly licensed physician. Under a statute making it manslaughter to kill another while engaged in the commission of a misdemeanor, it is sufficient to allege facts showing the commission either of a misdemeanor or a felony, without alleging that accused was committing a misdemeanor.[22]

§ 149. —— Assault and Battery and Infliction of Mortal Wound

Except as the common-law rules have been altered by statute, it is necessary where a homicide was caused by violence to allege the assault and the battery to have been on the deceased and that the assault caused the battery. Where the person killed was another than the one intended the assault should be alleged to have been on the person killed and not on the person intended.

Except in so far as the common-law rules may have been relaxed by statute, it is necessary where a homicide was occasioned by a violence to allege an assault[23] on the person on whom the battery was inflicted,[24] together with the connection of the assault with the striking and wounding,[25] and the indictment must contain a direct averment of the striking and wounding of deceased by accused,[26] although it is not necessary that the assault[27] or battery[28] shall in all cases be alleged expressly, and it is ordinarily regarded as sufficient to employ such language as in its ordinary acceptance shows the infliction of the wound,[29] and the connection between the assault and the infliction of the wound [30] A charge of killing by means of shooting has been held sufficient, although there is no direct allegation that the bullets struck and penetrated,[31] or entered[32] the body of deceased, but there is also authority to the contrary [33] So also indictments have been sustained in the absence of direct allegations that the contents of a firearm were discharged into the body of deceased,[34] or that wounds were inflicted by the shooting [35] Mere surplusage does not vitiate an allegation of assault [36]

Several assaults The indictment may allege a series of assaults on different dates, as a result of which death ensued, although not from any particular assault [37]

Killing of person other than the one intended An indictment for the murder of one person in an attempt to kill a different person need not allege an actual assault on the person designed to be killed [38] It should allege an assault on the person killed in all respects as though he were the intended victim [39]

Person unknown Accused may be charged with cooperating with a person unknown who directly inflicted the fatal wound [40]

Repetition It is not necessary to repeat the charge of the assault in the part of the indictment stating the mortal wound, where connectives such as "then and there" are employed.[41]

§ 150. —— Manner and Means of Killing

a In general
b Instrument or means used
c Manner of using weapon
d Form and sufficiency of statement

a. In General

At common law and under the statutes in certain jurisdictions the manner and means of the killing, if known, must be alleged, and if not known that fact must be stated, but under the statutes in force in many jurisdictions such averments have been dispensed with, and such statutes do not deprive the accused of any of his constitutional rights

At common law and under the statutes in force in certain jurisdictions the manner and means of the killing, if known, must be alleged in the indictment or information [42] In many jurisdictions, however, the necessity for such averments has been dispensed with under the statutes in force therein [43] In some jurisdictions it is held that, under statutes requiring only a clear and distinct statement of the offense in ordinary and concise language, the manner and means of the killing need not be set out,[44] but in other jurisdictions it is held that under such statutes the manner and means of the killing must be set out [45] Statutes obviating the necessity for

"Formerly great particularity was required in setting forth the manner of the death of the deceased and the means by which death was inflicted but it is the modern tendency of courts to relax the rigidity of requirements in indictments, and the particular circumstances of the offense under the modern practice and our statutes need not be charged unless they are necessary to constitute a complete offense"—Bramlett v State, 43 S W 2d 364, 365, 184 Ark 808

such averments do not dispense with the necessity of setting out the facts constituting the offense,[46] but an unnecessary or defective statement of the manner or means will not vitiate the indictment[47]

The omission of such averments has been held not to deprive accused of his constitutional rights,[48] such as his right to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation,[49] or to be charged by indictment, presentment, or impeachment,[50] and not to violate a statutory requirement of certainty regarding the offense charged[51]

Manner and means unknown In case the manner and means are unknown, such fact may be stated and a more specific statement will be excused,[52] and in some jurisdictions such an allegation is required[53]

b. Instrument or Means Used

Where an allegation as to the manner and means of the killing is required, the particular instrument of death or means used, if known, must be stated, and if unknown or only partially known an averment that such means are unknown, or unknown further than as averred, is required, but where the manner and means of the killing need not be alleged such a statement may be omitted, although it is usual to name the weapon employed

The requirement of a statement of the manner and means of the killing, see supra subdivision a of this section, requires that the indictment shall state the particular instrument or means of death used, if known,[54] but in jurisdictions where the manner and means of the killing need not be alleged, see supra subdivision a of this section, such a statement may be omitted,[55] although it is usual to name the weapon employed.[56]

Instrument of death unknown In case the instrument of death or means used is unknown it is sufficient to state that fact,[57] and in some states it must be expressly alleged,[58] an indefinite description being improper[59] Where the means by which the killing was accomplished are only partially known, such means, as far as known, should be alleged, with an averment that the means are unknown further than as averred[60]

c. Manner of Using Weapon

It is necessary in some jurisdictions to allege the manner in which the weapon used to kill was employed, but the details thereof, such as how and in what hand it was held, etc, need not be averred A charge that

Partial description

(1) A general description of the weapon with an averment that its exact character is unknown was sufficient—Waller v State, 138 S E 67, 164 Ga 128

(2) Description of instrument as a blunt instrument, a more particular description of which the county attorney was unable to give, was sufficient—State v. Elftman, 226 P. 795, 116 Kan 214.

Although the requirement of a statement of the facts and circumstances of the crime is sometimes held to render it necessary to state the manner in which the deadly weapon was employed,[61] it is apparently unnecessary to allege the way in which the instrument was held,[62] or that it was aimed and pointed at deceased,[63] or that it was in the hands of accused,[64] or in which hand,[65] or, if the killing was accomplished by shooting, the manner in which the firearm was discharged[66]

An indictment or information is not defective because it charges two or more persons with killing one person with one weapon[67] held in the hands of one of them,[68] or in the hands of all of them,[69] as it does not charge a physical impossibility,[70] although as to the latter the contrary has been held in a prosecution for assault and battery, see Assault and Battery § 110 g (1)

Where weapon not per se deadly It has been held in some jurisdictions that where the weapon used in committing the homicide is not per se a deadly or dangerous weapon the indictment or information must allege the manner in which it was used[71]

After verdict. The fact that the indictment does not show the manner in which the weapon was used cannot be urged after verdict[72]

d. Form and Sufficiency of Statement

(1) In general
(2) Homicide by poison

(1) In General

The manner and means of the homicide should be stated in ordinary and concise language, with as much certainty as possible, but a description of the weapon in general terms and without unnecessary detail is sufficient Different modes and means may be averred in the same or different counts, as may also allegations of specific modes and means and averments that they are unknown

The manner and means of the killing, when required to be stated, see supra subdivision a of this section, must be set out with as much certainty as the circumstances of the case will permit[73] As a general rule an averment in ordinary and concise language, such as to enable a person of ordinary understanding to know what was intended, is sufficient[74] Ordinarily where the commission of the

(2) An allegation that accused did kill deceased with a pistol, loaded, etc, from which shooting and wounding deceased died, inferentially alleges with sufficient clearness that the use of the pistol was by shooting it, and precludes any inference that the act constituting the crime was any other use of the pistol—Arnold v Commonwealth, 240 S W 87, 194 Ky 421

Allegation charging accused with killing deceased "by shooting him, the deceased, in the body with a pistol," is not dubious ambiguous, or demurrable for absence of an explanation as to how the pistol entered the body of the deceased, inasmuch as it is a matter of common knowledge that a statement that one had been shot with a pistol does not imply that the pistol itself entered the body of the person shot—Green v State, 158 S E 285, 172 Ga 635

Omission of "with"

(1) An information charging that accused and another "upon one C did make an assault and a dangerous and deadly weapon to wit, a pistol in their hands then and there had and held, at and against him did shoot off and discharge," etc, held not insufficient on the ground that the word "with" was omitted after the word "assault"—State v. Baird, 248 S W 596, 297 Mo 219.

homicide by means of a weapon is charged the indictment must specify the weapon by name or description.[75] A description of the weapon in general terms is sufficient,[76] it is unnecessary to give its dimensions and weight,[77] or to aver that it was one susceptible of producing, or likely to produce, death,[78] or deadly or dangerous,[79] unless the indictment is drawn under a statute employing such words in defining the crime,[80] or, in some jurisdictions, except where the weapon used in committing the homicide is not per se a dangerous weapon.[81] Where the murder was accomplished by shooting it is unnecessary to allege the particular variety of firearm used,[82] or with what it was loaded,[83] or that it was loaded;[84] and the indictment is not rendered uncertain by the fact that the character of the charge is stated by the employment of words in the alternative where such words are to be regarded as synonymous,[85] or by the fact that different terms are used to describe the character of the charge and the missile with which deceased was struck, where one of the terms used is a general term which includes the other in its meaning.[86]

An indictment is not defective by reason of the fact that it charges two or more persons with the actual shooting and killing of deceased.[87]

The means may be stated as continuous; that is, that whatever means were used were applied and continued for a shorter or longer period of time, and that death was ultimately caused by the means so described [88]

A state or condition of the body of deceased making the assault more dangerous need not be averred [89]

Different modes or means The homicide may be charged to have been committed by the use of different instruments or means[90] and by various modes or manners,[91] particularly where there is doubt as to how death was produced [92] Averments of different means and modes of commission of the homicide may be made in different counts [93] They may also be made in the same count in conjunctive form,[94] in which case the indictment or information is not objectionable for failure to state which caused death,[95] or they may be charged by alternative averments in the same count,[96] but in such case it has been held that each alternative averment must be construed as a separate count,[97] and each alternative charge must describe the means with the same definiteness or particularity as would have been required had the charge been made separately in a separate count [98] An averment that the manner or means by which the killing was accomplished is unknown may be made in the same count in which specific means are charged[99] in the conjunctive,[1] or in the alternative,[2] or such an averment may be made in a separate count in an indictment or information in which specific means are charged in other counts [3]

Reason why manner or means unknown Where it alleged that the means by which the homicide was committed are unknown it is not necessary to state why they are unknown,[4] and the fact that it might have been stated more explicitly why the instrument alleged to have been used in committing the homicide could not be more fully described does not invalidate the indictment [5]

(2) Homicide by Poison

To charge murder by poison ordinarily it is sufficient to allege that the poison was administered and that it caused death, and usually it is unnecessary to allege such details as how it was administered, the quantity given, the particular poison administered, or its deadly and poisonous character

An indictment for murder by poison is sufficient in general if it charges that the poison was administered and that such poison so administered caused death,[6] and it is not necessary to charge that accused caused deceased to take the poison by force, threats or fraud,[7] or that deceased had no

The case of Sanders v State, 112 S W 68, 54 Tex Cr 101, 22 L R A, N S 243 which held the indictment insufficient for failure to aver that accused caused deceased to take the poison either by force or threats, or by fraud, and that deceased did not voluntarily take the poison with knowledge of its nature, was overruled in so far as it held the indictment insufficient—Aven v State, 277 S W. 1080, 102 Tex Cr 478 knowledge that the substance administered to him was poison.[8] So also, under a statute making it murder to assist another in the commission of suicide, it is sufficient to charge that accused assisted deceased in the commission of suicide by procuring for him the poison used for that purpose.[9] However, to charge merely in general terms that accused poisoned deceased, without particularizing the acts complained of, is insufficient where the statute divides the crime of murder by poisoning according to the method employed, as by administering the poison to deceased, placing it within reach of deceased, mingling it with food or other substances, etc.[10] The indictment need not allege the nature of the poisoning[11] or state how the poison was administered.[12] An indictment for murder perpetrated by mingling poison in the food or drink of another need not aver that the poison was given to deceased by accused.[13] It is not necessary to state the amount administered[14] or that the quantity given was sufficient to cause death,[15] nor is it necessary to set out in detail the mode in which the poison affected the body or the particular organ on which it operated.[16]

Designation of particular poison At common law it was necessary to allege the kind of poison administered,[17] and, although it is now ordinarily held unnecessary to state the particular poison employed,[18] it is held in some jurisdictions that the name of the poison, if known, should be stated,[19] and if the name of the poison is not known that fact should be stated.[20] It may be averred that named poisons and others unknown were administered.[21] Where a particular poison is named, a subsequent reference to it in general terms is not a defect.[22]

Deadly or poisonous nature. It has been held unnecessary to allege specifically that the drug or substance given was deadly in its nature or of a poisonous character.[23] There is authority, however, which holds that if the drug or substance alleged to have been administered, as a matter of judicial cognizance, is poison, and when administered in sufficient quantity is deadly, it is sufficient to name the drug or substance in the indictment or information,[24] but if the substance administered is not poison, as a matter of judicial knowledge, the indictment should aver that the substance so administered was deadly poison, or such as was calculated to destroy human life.[25]

§ 151. —— Description of Mortal Wound

a In general
b Mortal character
c Location

a. In General

At common law it was necessary to describe the mortal wound with great particularity, giving its length, breadth, and depth, if possible, but such particularity is now generally unnecessary

While at common law great particularity in the description of the wound is deemed to be essential,[26] and its length, breadth, and depth, if incised, should be stated,[27] it is now generally held under the statutes governing criminal procedure that such particularity is unnecessary,[28] and in some jurisdictions no description of the wound is required.[29] So, as a general rule, it is not now essential to state its length, breadth, and depth,[30] and since it may be rejected as surplusage, an apparent repugnancy in the description of the wound is not fatal.[31] General averments of mortal injuries and mortal sickness, a further description whereof is to the jurors unknown, have been sustained.[32]

b. Mortal Character

A specific allegation as to the mortal character of the wound inflicted, although unnecessary in some jurisdictions, is generally required, but the use of the term "mortal" is not ordinarily essential where the language employed is otherwise sufficient to so characterize the injury.

In some jurisdictions a specific allegation as to the infliction of a mortal wound is unnecessary.[33] However, it is generally held necessary, where death is charged to have resulted from a stroke or blow, to aver that the wound inflicted thereby was mortal[34] and that death resulted therefrom, as considered infra § 154. It is not necessary to show that the wound was of a character likely to produce death,[35] but it is sufficient to allege that it was a mortal wound, and caused the death of the party.[36] While the term "mortal" has been held indispensable,[37] it has, on the other hand, been held sufficient to allege that deceased died from the wound inflicted,[38] or that accused killed and murdered deceased by shooting him,[39] and that the use of the word "mortal" is not imperative.[40] An indictment for murder by choking and strangling need not allege that the injury was "mortal."[41]

c. Location

The common-law rule requiring the particular location of the wound on the body to be averred has been generally abrogated, it being ordinarily sufficient to allege that it was on the body

According to the strict common-law rule, it is essential that the indictment shall state on what part of the body the wound causing the death was inflicted,[42] any repugnancy being fatal,[43] but in most jurisdictions such particularity is not now essential,[44] it being held in many cases sufficient to charge that it was "on the body."[45] However, allegations giving the location are proper,[46] but repugnancy and inconsistency in such allegations may be disregarded as surplusage,[47] and an indictment is not fatally defective which alleges one mortal wound on two parts of deceased's body.[48]

§ 152. Death

The necessity and sufficiency of averments as to the fact and the cause of the death of deceased and as to the time and place thereof are treated in detail infra §§ 153–155.

Examine Pocket Parts for later cases.

§ 153. —— Fact of Death

The death of the person for whose killing accused is charged must be alleged, but the authorities are not in accord as to what constitutes a sufficient allegation thereof

The fact of the death of the person for whose killing accused is indicted must be alleged.[49] It has been held a sufficient allegation of death to aver that accused killed deceased,[50] that he deprived deceased of life,[51] that he killed and murdered deceased,[52] or merely that he murdered deceased.[53] It has been held, on the other hand, insufficient to aver that accused murdered deceased,[54] or even that he killed and murdered deceased,[55] or mortally choked, suffocated, and drowned deceased.[56] An allegation in the conclusion that accused killed and murdered deceased is not sufficient.[57] That the omission of the word "did" before the word "die" vitiates the indictment has been affirmed[58] and denied.[59]

The indictment or information must allege that the death of deceased resulted from the criminal act or omission with which accused is charged.

The indictment must allege that the death of decedent resulted from the injury inflicted by accused,[60] or the act done by him,[61] or his negligence,[62] and, where manslaughter is charged based on a killing done in the commission of an unlawful act, it must allege facts which show that the unlawful act was the proximate cause of deceased's death.[63] However, where all persons present, aiding and abetting in the commission of the homicide, are considered principals in its commission, see supra §§ 7–9 it is not essential to the conviction of a participant to allege that he used the weapon with which the killing was done.[64] No particular form of words is necessary,[65] but it must be shown that the alleged act or acts of accused were the proximate cause of the death as distinguished from the cause of a condition affording an opportunity for the compassing of death by some other unconnected agency.[66] It has been held that it must appear that death was the natural and probable consequence of the act complained of,[67] and, to the contrary that, where the fact and cause of death are alleged in an indictment, it is not subject to attack on the ground that it does not show that the means of death were likely to produce death.[68] It is proper, where a

(1) Indictment averring that the mortal wound of which deceased died was the mortal wound inflicted by the bullet discharged from the gun held in the hand of accused is not uncertain, as not specifically averring that the mortal wound from which deceased died was the mortal wound inflicted by accused.—People v. Corder, 137 N.E. 845, 306 Ill. 264.

(2) An information, alleging that accused had pistol in his hands, discharged it against deceased, and shot latter with it, inflicting mortal wound resulting in instant death, was not defective as failing to connect accused with killing.—State v. Kenyon, 126 S.W. 2d 245, 343 Mo. 1168.

(3) An indictment charging that accused did "kill and murder" another by shooting him with a pistol and inflicting on him a mortal wound was not demurrable because not alleging specifically that victim died as result of the wound.—Harris v. State, 9 S.E. 2d 183, 190 Ga. 258.

After verdict it has been held that a verdict will obviate a defect arising from an omission to connect the injury inflicted and the death of deceased.[70]

§ 155. —— Time and Place

a Time
b Place

a. Time

As a general rule the indictment or information must allege the date of the death of the victim, so as to show that the death occurred within a year and a day from the date of the infliction of the injury

In the absence of a relaxation of the common-law rules, an indictment for homicide must allege the date of the death of the victim,[71] for the reason that it must appear from the indictment that the death occurred within a year and a day from the date of the infliction of the injury,[72] and an indictment which alleges as the date of death a date more than a year and a day subsequent to the date on which the infliction of the injury is alleged to have occurred does not allege a criminal homicide.[73] No particular form of allegation is required.[74] It is sufficient to state facts showing that the death was instantaneous,[75] or to allege that the wound or injury was inflicted on a certain date and that the victim died on a later certain date, which dates are not more than a year and a day apart,[76] or that the wound was inflicted on a certain date and that the victim died within a year and a day from the infliction of the wound.[77] It has also been held sufficient to allege the date of the striking or wounding and then that the victim instantly died therefrom,[78] or that the blow produced his immediate death,[79] but in some jurisdictions such words are regarded as in themselves insufficient,[80] unless the connection between the act and the death is further shown by the employment of the words "then and there,"[81] or by other sufficient words of connection.[82] An averment that deceased was injured on a certain day followed merely by a statement that he died is insufficient,[83] although an allegation that deceased "of the mortal wound aforesaid died" has been held sufficient as against the contention that the allegation should have read "of the mortal wound aforesaid then and there died."[84] An averment that accused killed deceased on a certain day is in some jurisdictions a sufficient allegation of the day of death,[85] and is construed to allege that he died on that date,[86] but there is authority to the contrary.[87] It is, in general, sufficient that it appear from the indictment that the death occurred within a year and a day after the assault which caused it.[88] Hence it is ordinarily held unnecessary to allege the exact date of the death where the date of the injury is laid within a year before the finding of the indictment,[89] or within the calendar year in which the indictment is returned,[90] and that in such case an omission of an allegation of the date of the death is immaterial,[91] especially where it is alleged that deceased died prior to the finding or filing of the indictment or information,[92] but there is authority requiring specific allegation of the date of death even in such circumstances.[93]

The date may be so stated at the beginning of the charging part as to apply to all its allegations, including that of the death.[94] Where time has been well laid to the giving of the mortal blow, it may be repeated as to the fact of death by words of reference such as "then and there,"[95] but such words must properly qualify the averment of death.[96]

It is not necessary to aver that deceased "languished and languishing did live until the date of death,"[97] and the fact that he is stated to have lived and languished, although death is alleged to have occurred on the day of the mortal blow, does not render the indictment repugnant,[98] nor is an allegation that deceased "languishing did live until" a certain day inconsistent with an allegation that the victim died on that day.[99]

Under statutes providing that an indictment shall not be held insufficient for any defect which does not tend to prejudice the substantial rights of defendants on the merits, it has been held unnecessary to make a specific allegation that death resulted within a year and a day after the infliction of the mortal wound in an indictment which sufficiently alleges that accused murdered deceased.[1]

b. Place

The place of death should be alleged, unless the necessity therefor is dispensed with by statute, as is true in a number of jurisdictions under statutes which, when the death and assault occurred in different counties, permit the prosecution to be in either county or in the county of the assault.

The place where the death of the injured person occurred should be set out in the indictment,[3] unless the necessity of such averment is dispensed with by statute.[4] As in the allegation of the time of death, the venue, when once alleged in the indictment, need not be repeated, but may be referred to by the use of "then and there."[5]

Death and assault in different counties or jurisdictions Where the mortal wound was given in one county and the victim died in another, in the interest of clarity it is better if the indictment charges the acts as having occurred in the county

County and state

The county and state where the death of deceased occurred should be alleged.—State v. Rector, 155 S.E. 385, 158 S.C. 212

Where indictment found

It has been stated, in a case in which the infliction of the wound and the death of the victim occurred in the same county, that "it was indispensable that the indictment should have averred that the murdered party did die in the county in which the indictment was found against the accused."—Alderson v. State, 145 N.E. 572, 574, 196 Ind. 22

(1) To show place of death.—State v. Stone, 13 P.2d 427, 169 Wash. 233

(2) Allegation that accused in specified county did "then and there" kill and murder deceased stated place of death in reasonably definite terms.—State v. Walters, 102 P.2d 284, 61 Idaho 341

Indictment construed

(1) Where indictment charged accused in M. county made assault, and that deceased then and there died of wounds, death was alleged to have occurred in M. county.—State v. Platt, 151 S.E. 206, 154 S.C. 1

(2) Indictment stating county where shooting occurred, and alleging that defendants "then and there * * * did kill and murder," sufficiently showed place of deceased's death.—State v. Rector, 155 S.E. 385, 158 S.C. 212.

where the wound was given and the consequences in the county where the victim died.[6] However, under statutes permitting the offender to be prosecuted in either county, although it has been held in a few jurisdictions that the indictment must allege both the place of the injury and the place of death,[7] in the majority of jurisdictions where the question has arisen it has been held that the crime may be charged in the indictment or information to have been committed in its entirety in the county where the indictment or information was found or filed, without any averment of the attendant circumstances as to the place of injury and of death.[8] Under statutes permitting or requiring the offender to be prosecuted in the county where the injury was inflicted, it is held that the indictment or information need not aver the place of death.[9] Where the mortal wound was given in one county and the victim died in another county and state, an indictment found in the county where the wound was given charges the commission of an offense therein where it alleges the facts as to the place of the injury and of the death.[10]

§ 156. Malice

b. Sufficiency of averment

a. Necessity of Averment

At common law and under the statutes in many jurisdictions, an averment that the killing was with malice aforethought is necessary in order to charge murder; but in other jurisdictions such an averment is unnecessary in an indictment which charges the offense in the language of the statute defining murder or according to an express statutory form, or which charges a killing by certain means or in the commission of certain unlawful acts. It need not be averred in charging manslaughter.

A charge that the killing was committed with malice aforethought is essential to the validity of an indictment charging murder at common law,[11] and generally such an averment is required under the statutes governing criminal procedure in the various states,[12] particularly where the statutes define murder as it was defined at common law,[13] and even under statutes which are in some degree variant from the common-law definition,[14] at least where certain degrees of murder are charged or penalties sought.[15] So under a statute dividing murder into degrees, which after defining murder in the first degree provides that all other murder at common law shall constitute murder in the second degree, it has been held that an indictment to charge second degree murder must, as an indictment for murder at common law, allege the killing to have been with malice aforethought.[16] Where such an averment is required an indictment alleg-

The court held that, if there was anything in the case of State v. Cummings, 5 La.Ann. 330 opposed to the doctrine that, where the mortal blow is given in one parish and death ensues in another, it is sufficient to charge in the indictment that the murder was committed in the parish where the indictment was found, without setting out in detail that the mortal wound was inflicted in one parish and the death occurred in another it was not disposed to follow it—State v. ing a homicide which does not charge it to have been committed with malice aforethought cannot charge an offense greater in grade than manslaughter.[17] Also, under a statute which makes murder of every voluntary killing, but provides that punishment in excess of a specified penalty cannot be assessed unless the killing was on malice aforethought, an allegation that the killing was on such malice aforethought is indispensable where the state seeks a greater penalty than that specified.[18]

In jurisdictions where the statutes specifically define murder or its degrees, or provide a specific form of indictment therefor, although it has been held essential to charge malice aforethought where the common-law instead of the statutory form of indictment is used,[19] it has been held proper in a number of jurisdictions to omit the technical words "malice aforethought" where the indictment follows the statute in charging the offense,[20] as where it charges a willful, deliberate, and premeditated killing,[21] or a killing with a premeditated design to effect death,[22] or that accused killed and murdered deceased,[23] or murdered deceased.[24] It has also been held unnecessary specifically to allege malice or malice aforethought where the manner and means of the killing as set forth in the indictment necessarily import malice,[25] or where the indictment sets forth the offense in the language of a statute which defines as murder a homicide resulting from certain prohibited acts.[26] So it has been held unnecessary to allege malice aforethought in an indictment charging a killing by means of poison,[27] or a killing in the perpetration of, or attempt to perpetrate, a specified felony,[28] although such an allegation is not inconsistent with a charge of a killing in the perpetration of, or attempt to perpetrate, a specified felony and will not render the indictment defective,[29] or the death of a mother by producing a miscarriage.[30] In other jurisdictions, however, the necessity of alleging malice or malice aforethought has been held not dispensed with in indictments charging a killing in the commission of, or as a result of, certain acts which the statutes provide shall be murder,[31] as a homicide committed in the perpetration of a felony,[32] or a killing by means of poison.[33]

Express or implied malice It is not necessary to allege whether the malice was express or implied, where malice aforethought is charged[34] Under a statute making the distinction between express and implied malice the distinction between murder in the first and second degrees, "malice aforethought" is sufficient to charge murder in either degree[35]

Feticide To charge feticide under a statute providing punishment for the willful killing of a "quick" unborn child by an injury to the mother which would be murder if it resulted in the death of the mother, the indictment must charge that the injury to the mother was inflicted with malice[36]

Manslaughter. On an indictment for manslaughter an allegation of malice aforethought is of course unnecessary,[37] and, where the crime is otherwise sufficiently charged, may be rejected as surplusage[38] It is not necessary to allege absence of malice,[39] but such an allegation does not render the indictment insufficient[40]

b. Sufficiency of Averment

In general where an averment of malice aforethought is essential it cannot be supplied by inference, but must be positively and directly alleged In some jurisdictions the exact expression must be used, but in other jurisdictions equivalent language is sufficient It must ordinarily be alleged as to the killing, and when properly alleged as to one element of the offense may be charged as to other elements by reference

Where an averment that the killing was with malice aforethought is regarded as essential, as considered supra subdivision a of this section, it cannot be supplied by inference,[41] and where the allegation as to malice aforethought is only made in the concluding clause it has been held insufficient[42] In some jurisdictions in making such an averment the exact words "malice aforethought" must be employed,[43] and an allegation of "malice" alone is not sufficient.[44] In other jurisdictions, however, it is not essential that the identical words, "malice aforethought," be used;[45] and the omission to use the exact expression may be supplied by any language which may be its legal equivalent,[46] or if from the language used in the indictment, it clearly appears that malice aforethought is charged[47] Under a statute providing that one who purposely and maliciously kills another shall be guilty of murder in the second degree, an indictment which sets forth such facts as necessarily import malice may be sufficient, although there is no direct averment of malice[48] The use of "of" instead of "with" is not a material variation[49] It has been held, also, that the omission of the pronoun whereby the malice aforethought is designated as that of accused does not render the indictment defective,[50] but there is other authority which holds that, where two or more persons are jointly indicted for the same murder under a common-law form of indictment, they must be charged to have committed the homicide of "their" malice aforethought, and to charge of "his" malice aforethought is fatal error[51] Where the indictment alleges that accused did unlawfully, willfully, feloniously, and of malice aforethought kill and murder deceased, it need not in addition use the word "malicious"[52]

Repetition The murder itself must generally be charged to have been done with malice aforethought, it is not sufficient to charge that the mor-

tal wound was so given,[53] but under statutes providing that ordinary and concise language, without repetition, is sufficient, it has been held unnecessary, where it is alleged that a mortal wound was inflicted with deliberate and premeditated malice, to repeat the allegation as to malice with respect to the killing.[54] Where the murder is charged to have been with malice aforethought, there is no necessity of repeating the charge in the description of the means,[55] especially under statutes of the kind just referred to,[56] and the fact that in the description of the means the words "unlawfully" and "feloniously" only are employed will not reduce the grade of the offense charged.[57] In case malice aforethought is charged with regard to the intent to kill, it is not necessary to charge it also with relation to the assault.[58] Where malice is properly alleged as to some elements of the offense, such allegations may be applied to other elements by reference.[59] In determining whether malice aforethought is properly averred with regard to the killing,[60] or to the assault,[61] the natural and grammatical construction of the words is to be considered, and in some cases the entire indictment has been resorted to.[62]

The evidence relied on to establish malice need not be alleged in the indictment.[63]

§ 157. Specific Intent to Kill

b Sufficiency of averment

a. Necessity of Averment

At common law and under the statutes in force in a number of jurisdictions, a specific allegation of an intent to kill is unnecessary in an indictment for murder, but in other jurisdictions such an averment is required; ordinarily it is unnecessary where the killing is charged to have been done in the commission of a felony. Such an averment is unnecessary in an indictment for manslaughter.

At common law an indictment for murder need not allege a specific intention to kill.[64] In some jurisdictions the intent or purpose to kill, made an ingredient of murder by statutory definition, must be alleged.[65] In other jurisdictions such an averment is not required,[66] or an express allegation of intent is held unnecessary where from the facts alleged, the intent to kill is manifest,[67] but the better practice would appear to be to aver the intent specifically even in those states in which the omission is not regarded as fatal.[68] An allegation of an intent to kill has been held unnecessary on a charge of murder committed while accused was engaged in the commission of a felony,[69] or by means of poison.[70] However, such an averment has been held essential to a charge of murder in the first degree where the homicide is alleged to have resulted from an attempt to produce a miscarriage,[71] or by administering poison.[72]

Where the killing of deceased occurred in an attempt to kill another person, it is sufficient merely to allege an intent to kill deceased without alleging in detail the killing of deceased while attempting and intending to kill the other person.[73]

Feticide. To charge feticide under a statute providing punishment for the willful killing of a "quick" unborn child by an injury to the mother which would be murder if it resulted in the death of the mother, the indictment must charge that the injury to the mother was inflicted with intent to kill her[74]

Manslaughter An indictment for manslaughter need not charge intent to kill,[75] nor is it necessary to allege the negative that the killing was done without a design to effect death[76] An indictment insufficient to sustain a charge of murder in the first degree under a statute, by reason of its failure to charge a purpose to kill, may be sufficient to support a judgment for manslaughter[77]

Criminal intent In some jurisdictions where a short form of indictment is prescribed, it is unnecessary to allege a criminal intent[78]

b. Sufficiency of Averment

Where an averment of intent to kill is required, it should be made positively and directly in the description of the offense, and as to the killing as well as to the assault, it cannot be made by inference or in the conclusion of the indictment only, but words of reference may be used to apply it to different elements of the offense

Where the intent to kill is regarded as a necessary averment, as considered supra subdivision a of this section, it cannot be alleged by mere inference[79] In such cases it is ordinarily held that a positive and direct averment of a purpose or intention to kill, in the description of the offense, is required,[80] and, although there is some authority to the contrary,[81] that the conclusion of the indictment will not aid a defective averment[82] The intent must be alleged as to the killing as well as to the assault,[83] although the allegation may be by the use of appropriate words of reference to the intent alleged as to the assault[84] An averment of intent as to the killing is applicable also as to the assault[85] Where purpose is laid to the charge of killing, the fact that in the description of the means the words "unlawfully" and "feloniously" only are employed will not reduce the grade of the offense charged[86] An allegation which charges an intent to kill is not insufficient because of the omission of the word "specific" before the word "intent"[87] An allegation that accused deliberately, premeditatedly, and with malice aforethought murdered the victim is sufficient to charge the intent to kill,[88] as is an allegation that the homicide was committed unlawfully and with malice aforethought,[89] or purposely,[90] or that the killing was willful, deliberate, and premeditated[91] Under a statute which defines murder as the voluntary killing of a person, an averment that it was done with malice aforethought is sufficient,[92] as is also an averment that accused did voluntarily kill deceased[93]

b Sufficiency of averment

a. Necessity of Averment

In some jurisdictions an allegation that the killing was done deliberately and premeditatedly is required, and in others it is not, where the killing is alleged to have been committed in the commission of a felony, such an averment is unnecessary, but if made will not invalidate the indictment

93. Tex —Crutchfield v. State, supra.

Although the terms are employed in the statutory definition of murder, in some jurisdictions the killing need not be alleged to have been done "deliberately and premeditatedly" where an indictment charges it to have been with malice "aforethought,"[94] and this is of course true where the statute expressly authorizes the indictment to be in the common-law form,[95] or where the statute prescribes a form of indictment which shall be sufficient and which omits an averment of deliberation and premeditation.[96] Such indictments are held not to contravene the constitutional rights of accused.[97] In other jurisdictions, however, it has been held that deliberation and premeditation must be alleged where they constitute an essence of the crime,[98] although deliberation need not be alleged in charging a particular degree of murder where it is not an element thereof.[99] In such case an indictment or information which does not properly allege the word "deliberation" or its equivalent is insufficient,[1] and an averment of malice aforethought will not take the place thereof.[2]

Commission of felony Where murder committed in the perpetration of a felony is expressly made murder in the first degree, an averment of deliberation and premeditation necessary to constitute murder in the first degree generally need not be made.[3] However, such an allegation is not inconsistent with the charge of a killing in the perpetration of, or attempt to perpetrate, a specified felony and will not render the indictment defective,[4] and, where deliberation and premeditation are unnecessarily alleged, they may be regarded as surplusage.[5]

b. Sufficiency of Averment

When required the averment of deliberation and premeditation must be made directly and not by inference, by either the exact expression or words equivalent thereto, and ordinarily with reference to the killing itself

The averment of deliberation and premeditation, when regarded as necessary, as shown supra subdivision a of this section, must be made directly and not by inference.[6] However, the language employed will be given its natural and grammatical construction,[7] and words equivalent to "deliberation" and "premeditation" are sufficient.[8] An averment of deliberation has been held to include premeditation within its meaning,[9] but "deliberately" has been held not included within the meaning of "willfully and premeditatedly."[10] Although it has been held that an averment of deliberation and premeditation as to the assault sufficiently avers it as to the death,[11] as a general rule such averment must be made with reference to the killing itself,[12] or to the fatal stroke.[13] The averment once properly made may be applied to subsequent allegations by appropriate words of reference.[14] When alleged as to the killing it has been held to refer also to the assault.[15] Where deliberation and premeditation are laid to the charge of killing, the fact that in the description of the means the words "unlawfully" and "feloniously" only are employed will not reduce the grade of the offense charged.[16]

In jurisdictions where it is not necessary to allege deliberation and premeditation, as shown supra subdivision a of this section, the use of the terms "deliberately" and "premeditated" to characterize the averment as to malice aforethought instead of the killing is immaterial and will not invalidate the indictment [17]

Conclusion It has been held that a failure to make a proper allegation of deliberation and premeditation in the body of the indictment will not be supplied by an averment in the conclusion that the prisoner did of deliberate and premeditated malice kill deceased,[18] but there is authority to the contrary [19]

§ 159. Deliberate and Premeditated Design

a Necessity of averment
b Sufficiency of averment

a. Necessity of Averment

In some jurisdictions an allegation that the killing was with a deliberate and premeditated design, or a premeditated design, is required, and in others it is not, but, where the killing is alleged to have been committed in the commission of a felony, such an averment is unnecessary, and as a general rule an averment that it was committed without any design to effect death is also unnecessary

In some jurisdictions an indictment or information is sufficient without the employment of such phrases as "deliberate and premeditated design"[20] or "premeditated design"[21] to effect death In other jurisdictions, however, "premeditated design" must be alleged [22]

Commission of felony Where one is charged with murder while engaged in the commission of a felony, it is not necessary to allege that the homicide was perpetrated with a design to effect death [23] Under a statute making homicide murder when perpetrated without any design to effect death by a person engaged in the commission of any felony, it has been held in some jurisdictions that the information should state that the homicide was committed without any design to effect death,[24] but in other jurisdictions such an averment has been held unnecessary [25] However, where the indictment avers that the killing was committed without a design to effect death, it will not authorize a conviction of a homicide of which a design to effect death is an essential element [26]

b. Sufficiency of Averment

Where an allegation of deliberate and premeditated design, or premeditated design, is required, it should be made as to a particular person, and as to the killing, and not merely as to the assault, the exact words need not be used, but words equivalent thereto are sufficient

In jurisdictions where it is regarded as essential to charge that the killing was with premeditated design to effect the death of the person killed, the averment must be made as to some particular human being [27] However, where one kills a person by mistake while attempting and intending with premeditated design to kill another person, the indictment in such a case properly alleges that the premeditated design was to effect the death of the person actually killed [28] In making such allegation it is not essential that the words "premeditated design" be used, but it is sufficient if words equivalent thereto, or of the same import, are employed [29]

(1) An information charging accused with a premeditated design to effect the death of a named sheriff of a named county, and any other officer who might attempt to inquire into and interfere with designated activities carried on by accused, is sufficiently specific as to the person against whom the design and intent of accused were directed—State v Baker, 272 P 80, 150 Wash 82

(2) An indictment is not defective for charging a design on the part of accused to "effect the death of" deceased "or another," since the intent is presumed from the fact of killing deceased, and the disproving of such intent is open to accused—State v Miller, 186 N W 803, 151 Minn 386

(1) Information charging that homicide was committed with deadly weapon with intent to kill deceased, and that deceased died from mortal wound, as intended by accused, sufficiently charged premeditated design

It is insufficient to allege that the act was committed with malice aforethought,[30] or deliberate and premeditated malice,[31] but language which expresses a premeditated intent to kill sufficiently charges a premeditated design to effect death.[32] It is insufficient to allege the premeditated malice as to the assault alone without averring it as to the killing,[33] but, where such an allegation has been made as to the assault, it may be made as to the killing by the use of appropriate words of reference.[34] A charge that accused willfully killed deceased is not equivalent to "with a design to effect death,"[35] but, where it is alleged that the act which results in death was committed by accused with a premeditated design to kill, it is sufficient.[36]

§ 160. Willfulness, Unlawfulness, and Feloniousness

a Willfulness
b Unlawfulness
c Feloniousness
d Homicide in perpetration of another offense

a. Willfulness

As a general rule, although there is some authority to the contrary, willfulness need not be averred in an indictment for murder. Where it is necessary to aver, it cannot be charged by inference, but equivalent words are sufficient, and words of reference may be used to apply it to different elements charged

An averment that the killing was "willful" is not essential in a common-law form of indictment for murder,[37] and is not required under the procedure in use in a number of jurisdictions,[38] including those in which a short form of indictment is prescribed which does not include an averment as to willfulness,[39] and, where such an averment is made, it may be considered as surplusage.[40] Under some statutory provisions, however, willfulness must be charged.[41] Where it must be charged that the killing was willful, equivalent language may be used instead of the exact technical word.[42] Thus "willfully" is supplied by "feloniously,"[43] or "maliciously,"[44] or "malice aforethought."[45] It cannot be charged by inference,[46] but it may be alleged once in such a way as to apply to more than one element of the offense.[47] In case willfulness is alleged as to the intent to kill, it has been held unnecessary to repeat it with relation to the assault,[48] and, where willfulness has been alleged in the body of the indictment as to the assault and wounding, it may be alleged in the conclusion as to the killing.[49]

Meaning of term The term "willful," as used in the charge of murder, has been held to mean intentionally or designedly done and not accidentally.[50]

Former rule

(1) Under a former statute which prescribed as a proper short form of indictment for murder the charge "that the defendant did feloniously, willfully and of his malice aforethought kill and murder the deceased," the word 'willfully" could not be omitted, but was required to be employed where the statutory form of indictment was used State v Robinson, 78 So 933 143 La 513 —State v Williams, 87 La Ann 776

(2) However, where the common-law, instead of the statutory, form of indictment was used, the word "willfully" did not have to be employed--State v Robinson, supra

(3) The case of State v Williams, supra, decided under such former statute, in holding that the omission of the word "willfully" in an indictment in the statutory form rendered it fatally defective, declared that the case of State v Harris, 27 La Ann 572, which reached a different conclusion, had been clearly, although impliedly, reversed by later cases

The authorities are not in accord as to the necessity for an express averment that the killing was unlawful; where required, an averment containing language equivalent to the word "unlawful" is sufficient

An express averment that the killing was unlawful is unnecessary in an indictment for murder in a number of jurisdictions, including a number of those in which the word "unlawful" is used in the statutory definition of murder,[51] and including those in which a short form of indictment prescribed by statute does not include an averment as to unlawfulness.[52] On the other hand, it has been held under a statute defining murder as a killing without authority of law that the indictment must contain such an averment,[53] and that, where it is an essential element of the homicide charged, as manslaughter, unlawfulness must be averred either expressly or by the use of such terms or such a statement of facts as conclusively implies it.[54]

In jurisdictions where the statutes prescribe as a sufficient form to charge murder the averment that accused murdered deceased, see supra § 146, the word "murdered" includes in its legal significance the unlawful killing.[55]

Where an averment of unlawfulness is required, it is not necessary to allege it in the exact language in which it is made a constituent part of the statutory definition of the homicide charged,[56] although it is preferable,[57] and any other equivalent language is sufficient.[58]

Even though it is unnecessary to allege expressly that the killing was unlawful, it does not vitiate the indictment so to state,[59] and, where alleged, it may be considered as surplusage.[60]

c. Feloniousness

At common law and under the statutes in many jurisdictions, although not in all, an averment of feloniousness in the commission of the offense is required, it must be made in positive language as to the killing or wounding, and in some jurisdictions also as to the assault, but, when once charged, words of reference may be employed to apply it to subsequent allegations.

At common law and under the statutes in many jurisdictions in an indictment for murder it is necessary to allege that the offense was committed feloniously or with felonious intent.[61] However, where the word "feloniously" is not used in the statutory definition of the homicide charged, the indictment or information need not charge that it was done feloniously,[62] and in jurisdictions where a short form of indictment is prescribed by statute which does not include an averment as to feloniousness, such an averment is unnecessary,[63] and in such case, when averred, it may be considered as surplusage.[64]

The averment as to feloniousness must be in positive language,[65] but an allegation that the homicide was perpetrated with a felonious intent sufficiently charges that it was feloniously committed.[66] Under some statutes it is unnecessary that the assault, as well as the killing, should be alleged to have been felonious;[67] and there is authority that an averment that the acts which finally resulted in the death of deceased were done feloniously is sufficient, even though it fails to charge the killing in such manner.[68] Under other statutes, however, the allegation of feloniousness should be made as to the assault[69] and also as to the wounding,[70] and an allegation of feloniousness merely as to the shooting or other assault is insufficient.[71] It is not necessary to repeat, in connection with each act necessary to constitute the crime of murder, that accused did it feloniously,[72] but, if the word "feloniously," used in connection with one element charged, is so connected with the allegations of the other elements as fairly to modify them, it is sufficient.[73]

d. Homicide in Perpetration of Another Offense

Averments of unlawfulness, willfulness, and feloniousness need not be made when the homicide is charged to have been committed in the commission of a felony

Where a killing committed in the perpetration of, or attempt to perpetrate, specified felonies is by express statutory provision made murder in the first degree, an indictment which charges a killing in the commission of one of the specified felonies need not allege that accused unlawfully, willfully, and feloniously killed deceased.[74]

§ 161. Knowledge

Knowledge, which constitutes an element of the crime, need not be expressly alleged where it is clearly shown by the use of other terms or allegations

Knowledge, where an element of the crime, need not be expressly alleged where it is clearly shown by the use of other terms.[75] In an indictment for murder by poison, it is unnecessary to allege that accused knew the substance employed to be a deadly poison,[76] at least when the intent to kill is alleged.[77] So it is held that a count for manslaughter by furnishing a deadly poison to a purchaser who asked for liquor need not allege knowledge of accused of the poisonous character of the substance delivered, but, on the other hand, it has been held that a count for the sale of liquor in which a poison had been mixed must allege such knowledge, or facts from which it may be inferred, although the sale of the liquor was unlawful.[78] In a prosecution for murder by mixing poison in the drink of another, it cannot be objected after verdict that it was not alleged that accused knew that deceased had any intention of drinking the liquid in which the poison was mixed.[79]

Knowledge of dangerous character of negligent act In a prosecution for negligent homicide an indictment need not aver that danger of death was apparent to accused, an averment that the danger was apparent being sufficient.[80] When the act causing death is one of gross carelessness or of foolhardy presumption, knowledge of its dangerous nature need not be averred,[81] but a count charging manslaughter in the operation of an unsafe airplane which was structurally or aerodynamically unfit or unstable for flight must aver that such infirmities in the aircraft were known to accused.[82]

In an indictment under a statute providing whoever purposely and willfully kills a policeman in the discharge of his duty is guilty of murder in the first degree, and shall be punished by death, it is not necessary to aver that accused knew deceased was an officer, since the words 'purposely" and "willfully" carry the meaning of designedly and knowingly, although such knowledge must be proved on the trial.—Holt v. § 162. Designation of Crime or Degree

In many, although not all, jurisdictions, it is unnecessary for an indictment to designate or charge a particular degree of unlawful homicide. An indictment in common-law form, or following a statutory definition or form for murder, is generally sufficient to charge murder in the first degree as well as murder in the second degree.

Under a statute requiring the name of the offense for which the indictment or information is brought to be stated in the accusatory part thereof, it is sufficient to designate the offense as murder without specifying the degree;[83] and an indictment designating the offense as murder is proper under a statute providing that an indictment may charge the commission of a felony generally or, in a proper case, of the crime of murder.[84] In those states in which the name of the offense is regarded as matter of form, it may be rejected under a statute providing for the rejection of surplusage and accused tried for the crime defined by the statement of facts.[85] It has been held to be of no moment that the name of the crime is incorrectly stated in the accusatory clause of the indictment or information if the specific allegations of the fact are sufficient, for the latter in such case control the character of the crimes presented.[86]

Under some statutes an indictment or information charging the crime of murder must be so drawn as to cover the various degrees thereof,[87] and hence should not specify any particular degree,[88] although an attempt to specify the degree is not a fatal defect.[89] In many jurisdictions, although murder is by statute divided into degrees which are specifically defined, an indictment which is sufficient to constitute a charge of murder generally under the law of the state is good, even though it does not designate the degree charged or allege matters which would restrict the charge to a particular degree.[90] Under this rule, an indictment for murder in the common-law form or substantially in such form,[91] or in the language of the statute defining murder generally,[92] may be sufficient, and in some of such jurisdictions an indictment in such form is expressly authorized by statute.[93] Such an indictment or information is held to embrace an accusation of murder in the first degree,[94] provided it does not allege anything to show that the murder was not one in the first degree.[95] In some states, however, the circumstances differentiating the degrees must be inserted in the indictment, so that where deliberation and premeditation are not charged, the indictment, in order to charge first degree murder, must show that it was committed under some of the peculiar circumstances defined by the statute,[96] as in the perpetration of one of the offenses named in the statute,[97] or by means of poison,[98] or torture,[99] or lying in wait.[1] Some statutes require the indictment to designate the degree of the crime,[2] which may be done by an averment that murder in a particular degree was committed, added after a statement of the offense in the common-law form,[3] or by alleging, in addition to the common-law requirements, willfulness, deliberation, and premeditation.[4] Apart from the question of whether or not the name of the offense or its degree must be designated, it has been held by various authorities that it is not necessary to charge in terms "murder in the first degree"[5]

In conformance with the general rule stated supra § 139, an indictment in the form expressly set out by statute is sufficient to charge murder in the first degree,[6] even though it does not in terms or by its allegations restrict the charge to a particular degree[7] An indictment following the language or charging the elements contained in a statutory definition of murder in the first degree is sufficient,[8] as is an indictment charging murder in the first degree in direct and explicit language[9]

Second degree It has been held that the grand jury may prefer an indictment for murder in the second degree, although not expressly authorized by statute so to do,[10] and clearly where they are permitted to do so by express statutes[11] The enactment of such a statute is within the power of the legislature, and its provisions are not in conflict with statutes permitting the trial jury to fix the degree[12] An indictment drawn specifically for murder in the second degree is generally sufficient if it contains material averments of an indictment in the first degree, omitting[13] or negativing[14] the matter of aggravation which differentiates the degrees It need not allege that the act producing the death was "an act imminently dangerous to another" to accord with a statutory definition of the offense, but it is sufficient to describe the act[15] An indictment for murder in the second degree is sufficient if it alleges all the essential elements of that degree of the crime[16]

Instead of indicting for murder in the second degree, it is a common practice to indict for murder in the first degree and, where the evidence requires, take a conviction for murder in a lower degree,[17]

an indictment in the common-law form[18] or a good indictment for murder in the first degree[19] being sufficient for murder in the second degree, and there being in some states no indictment for murder in a particular degree[20] It has been held that the grand jury has no power, where an indictment charges murder in the first degree, to return a true bill for murder in the second degree[21] A nolle prosequi to so much of an indictment charging murder in the first degree as charges deliberate and premeditated malice will not invalidate the indictment as a charge of murder in the second degree[22]

§ 163. Manslaughter

An indictment or information may properly be drawn for manslaughter alone, and an indictment for manslaughter is generally sufficient if it alleges all the elements of the offense, or states the charge in the language of the statute or in statutory form

Although an indictment for murder is generally sufficient to embrace a charge of manslaughter,[23] where the facts and circumstances justify it, an indictment or an information may charge manslaughter alone[24] Under the statutes in some jurisdictions it is sufficient to charge manslaughter to merely allege that accused unlawfully killed deceased,[25] but as a general rule an indictment for manslaughter must allege the acts constituting the offense[26] Under some statutes the indictment or information may be drawn as for murder omitting the elements of aggravation[27] The omission of the words "in the heat of passion," as employed in a statutory definition, has been held not material,[28] but under some statutes, such words,[29] or, as an alternative, the words "in sudden affray,"[30] must be used Where it is not included in the statutory definition of the particular degree of manslaughter charged, it is not necessary to allege that the homicide was committed in the heat of passion[31] The indictment need not allege that the acts were done by accused "in the fury of his mind"[32] That an indictment alleges elements of a higher degree of homicide does not vitiate it as a charge of manslaughter,[33] and where the facts alleged constitute one grade or degree of manslaughter, the fact that the accusatory clause of the indictment charges a different and greater grade or degree does not invalidate the indictment[34] The absence of apt words characterizing the acts to have been done with malice aforethought and the declaration that the crime intended to be charged is manslaughter,[35] or the statement of an intent to commit a less crime,[36] is a sufficient declaration that the homicide was accomplished without design to effect death While, as respects the indictment, there is no distinction at common law between voluntary and involuntary manslaughter,[37] where by statute voluntary and involuntary manslaughter are made distinct offenses, the indictment must contain facts rendering it certain which offense is charged,[38] although it is not necessary expressly to allege whether the homicide was voluntary or involuntary[39] Where the manner and means of the killing are set out, matter differentiating the degrees need not be averred [40]

In general, an indictment for manslaughter which alleges all the essential elements of the offense is sufficient [41] In conformity with the general rules stated supra § 141, an indictment charging manslaughter in the language of the statute,[42] or in the form expressly authorized by statute,[43] or substantially in such form,[44] is sufficient; but a statutory short form for manslaughter has been held insufficient to charge involuntary manslaughter [45] Where means by which accused may be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation are available, an indictment charging the offense of manslaughter by name may be sufficient,[46] particularly where such an indictment is expressly authorized by statute.[47]

B ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO MURDER OR KILL

§ 164. Elements of Offense in General

The elements of the offense of assault with intent to murder or kill must be set out in the indictment or information.

Under the rules applicable to indictments and informations generally, the elements of the offense of assault with intent to murder or kill as defined by the various statutes must be set out in the indictment or information [48] It has been held that the same particularity of averment is not necessary in an indictment for an assault with intent to kill as is required in an indictment for murder [49]

Under statutes, a statement of the offense in ordinary and concise language is usually sufficient [50] A statement of the offense is sufficient, which, in addition to the averments required by statute, fully advises accused of the offense with which he is charged,[51] or a statement of which the meaning is plain to a common intent,[52] which is so plain as to enable a person of ordinary common sense or understanding to know what is intended,[53] or which is so plain that the nature of the offense may be easily understood by the jury [54]

An indictment is not vitiated merely because it is awkwardly constructed, inartificially drawn, and ungrammatical [55] The ordinary rules of grammatical construction are to be applied, however, in determining the sufficiency of allegations [56] Surplusage may be disregarded [57]
